I. It comes right from the very heart of me.

Because I have not been able to hear you on the radio I have found myself reading your "Daily Counsels." They have been a godsend to me. Another very interesting find for me is a little book called "These Twelve," by Dean Brown of Yale. Is it not helpful? I feel most drawn to St. Peter, because there is in me too much of the impulsive for my own good. I wish this little book could travel far. It is one that can be read and understood by the plain folks everywhere.

There are so many people roaming around this world with heartaches, who have failures, misfortunes, warping bitternesses, and despairs. They need help from many sources, according to their type. Some of them may find it in a verse of poetry, a beautiful hymn, the laughter of their children, or the love of their home.

Whatever the source, it gives to them that divine hour which enables them to go on again; their memories, hopes, courage, and dreams come back to them. A great many are giving of their strength day by day, often to unlovely tasks almost beyond their own endurance, and after a while bodily weariness is dominant. The mind grows indifferent, pluck isn't so easily reborn, the desire for better things gradually fades, and they drift along aimlessly. I find many of them are unafraid of death, because the grave offers them a chance to rest. Doesn't this sound very dreadful? But in trying to do my bit in a quiet way I find it is not only dreadful but true.

Do you remember my saying that I was going to try to do a kindness to someone each day. It has been a great game, but oh, the misery it has revealed! I no longer feel amazed when people question the goodness of God, or feel, as did the old poet, that nothing can compensate for the insolence of birth. When a very tired mother of eight sickly children said to me, "I am sick of hearing of the duty we owe to our Maker. Has He not some duty to us also?" I knew a crushed heart was behind that remark. The pity of it all is that a heart can reach such a state that it allows the tongue such license.

But to turn to happier things: Would you like to know that I too have had a vacation. Two weeks in Maine, and for a little space I felt the delicious sense of coming into my own again. I wakened in the morning, my hunger for sleep satisfied. I reveled in the glorious sunshine and drowsed in the shade of the pines to the hum of bees and singing birds. I feasted on sandwiches out of a shoebox on the days when I went fishing. I bunched roses in blue bowls and filled my room with sweet peas and mignonette. Then in the starry night, out in the sweet-scented garden, with the lovely moon giving me her benediction, I found ineffable peace.

So my tired heart, revolting and dissatisfied, comes loyally back to its own, and the storm abates. The halcyon days went all too soon, and it was a real hardship to leave my woods and birds, my spaces and my cloistered quiet and to come back to the city.

And now I have something else to tell you. I am leaving Brooklyn to take a new position, and although I shall commute daily, it is too far away to come often to hear you. I feel very depressed at the thought, but I must go because the work is far more remunerative, and I need all my pennies to meet the responsibilities that are mine. Would you believe that I have been making ten dollars a month keep me in the things I need after my room, board, and home money has been taken care of? Of course, this includes my donation to the man behind the wicket who is storing up a sum for the old age that I hope is to be mine. But that little sum procures me all my magazines, my daily newspaper, my extra car fare, writing material, stamps, church offertory, 'phone calls, shoe shines, toilet articles, my extra lunches, etc., etc. Now don't you truly think that is economy, thrift, and fortitude forced out of poverty?

I don't want poverty to get too close to me, because I think it is likely to be degrading. So far it has not touched me that way; but it can and does give one a feeling of inferiority; a sense of having failed. I suppose this is often inevitable, but do you wonder that the "Man with the Hoe" became a "thing that grieves not and that never hopes"! Surely poverty does tend to keep your eyes fixed on the furrow rather than on the glorious blue sky.

You cannot know how sad my heart feels in leaving you. You have been so wonderful to me, even though you do not know me by sight, and have never spoken to me personally. But you have been so comforting and helpful, and I have been so alone in this battle of life, oh! so dreadfully alone, Doctor Cadman, with so few weapons to fight the battle; just a fundamental sincerity and a faith in God. I feel myself reaching out for relief from the dissatisfaction within me and I am finding that relief in the new life I am experiencing.

Any magazine should be proud to print this letter from one of God's unknown heroines, who would blush to give her gallant fight a name. What a contrast her confession makes with those of her sisters who are sick of the social whirl, yet haven't the resolution to get out of it, or who covet more and better clothes than there is money to buy, or who fret and scold because they cannot have their cake and eat it, or who want a good-looking partner, tall, clever, a capital conversationalist, without a blemish on his record, having a substantial income, and a car of the latest model waiting at the door.

I FORGET who it was that said "not wanting a thing is comparable to possessing it." We must look to the fences of our desires. We must remember that

The golden hopes men set their hearts upon and we must come back to simplicity and humility, to kindness and truth. We must live each day for the good it may bring to others, rather than to the material gain it may yield to ourselves.

And so the letters come in an endless stream. The idea that God is against them pollutes countless creatures of His love and providence.

Often I hear from a man who cannot reconcile the divine attributes with the tragedies of individuals and of history. He insists that the Deity shall justify His government of the universe. Another writer, generally a woman staggering under bereavement, will not accept the Will which is her peace. Yet how many I could mention who have—

. . . that blessed mood
In which the burden of the mystery,
In which the heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible world
Is lightened,

because they walk by faith, not by sight. Their influence upraises the circles in which they move. They seldom miss the appointed path. They do not ask too much of life; they ask life for but one gift: the power to serve and to serve sacrificially. Is it too presumptuous to recommend their habit?

Napoleon asked for the earth, and got a rock in the ocean on which to die. Sir Isaac Newton gave himself to human service and the heavens register his work. The noblest Being who ever appeared among us enacted that he who would be the greatest among us should be the servant of the rest.

The Suppressed Story of Mrs. Jackson

letter. The currency was currency, and unquestionably in Colonel Post's possession at the time of death. If Mrs. Jackson didn't claim it, then probably she was right. No one else would. Moreover, one couldn't cross-examine Mrs. Jackson. You could look at her, but that was just about all. Certainly, you couldn't snatch a letter out of her hand. His gestures on departure reminded me of my own defeat in the first interview with this charming, mysterious, and altogether lovely lady.

"You'll remain a few minutes, I'm sure," she said to me. Would I? Indeed yes. Presently the lawyer was gone, and Mrs. Jackson and I were again seated.

"You are the young man who wished to interview me," she said, smiling beautifully. "Colonel Post told me about you. He told me that he was going to give one of three young men a story that I also know. I don't know the other two young men. You were to decide by lot. Who won?"

"I did, Mrs. Jackson."

"Well, I'm glad. Because I know you. Colonel Post was very fond of his young squirrels, as he called you boys."

"We were very fond of him, too, Mrs. Jackson."

"I know you must have been. He was a rare and beautiful soul. He would not have disappointed you about that story, for he was honor itself. I'm going to tell you the story and you can furnish your own seals."

"That is very kind of you, Mrs. Jackson. I am all eagerness and attention."

"I am sure Colonel Post would wish me to tell you. Will you smoke?"

"Thanks."

Mrs. Jackson folded her hands in her lap and gazed dreamily at the ceiling.

"A LONG, long time ago," she began, "there was an ugly, scrawny little girl who lived on a farm and ran about bareheaded and barefooted. She had a frowsy, uncombed head of sun-dried hair that was neither blond nor brunet. Nowhere, nowadays, would you see such an ugly, skinny little creature, so I must ask you to use your imagination freely. Girls such as the one I am telling about have simply disappeared from the earth. In spite of the fact that this girl was plainly born to wield a hoe, she was obsessed by impossible dreams of a glorious life among cultured people and luxurious surroundings. Poor child, she could barely read and write. Knowing almost nothing of the world, she thought of this city, which was then just an overgrown village, as a great metropolis, probably paved with gold and resplendent with jeweled towers; a place where men and women wore gorgeous silks, and spent most of their time parading up and down wide boulevards on prancing white horses.

"So that little girl, when she was seventeen years old, took eight dollars out of an old cracked teapot and ran away from home. I am not certain whether she stole

"I'm going to raise his salary"

"I've had my eye on him for some time and I know he can handle bigger work.

"He studies those I. C. S. textbooks every chance he gets, and I want to tell you it has made him a valuable man for this business.

"I'm going to raise his salary and give him that new job we were talking about. I wish we had more men like him."

How do you stand when your employer checks up his men for promotion? Does he pass you by as just a routine worker, or does he think of you as a man who is ambitious to get ahead? Won't you be far more likely to get the promotion if he knows you are studying at home and are really preparing yourself to handle bigger work?

Think it over. Then act. It takes only a moment to mark and mail the coupon and find what the International Correspondence Schools can do for you, yet that one simple little step may be the means of changing your whole life. "Do it now."

the eight dollars or not. Her father probably thought so, but she had hoed many, many acres of cotton and had not eaten a great deal. Anyway, she came to this city expecting to do something very grand, though she had only hazy notions as to what it would be.

"Her first sight of the great metropolis was a bitter disappointment, for the streets were muddy and the whole place looked wet and dismal; but she couldn't go back because she had spent six of her eight dollars for railroad fare. Moreover, she was afraid of her father. So she started out to look for work.

"Now, it had seemed to this girl, before she left the farm, that there would be a tall man wearing a velvet coat who would meet her in front of a marble castle and say, 'Come in, Princess, and sing for us.' And, in her dream, she was to go in and sing, at the same time charming everyone who saw her. But the poor girl couldn't sing; as a matter of fact, she couldn't do anything. Presently she was tramping the streets, fearfully tired, painfully hungry, asking waiters in cheap restaurants if they needed anyone to wash dishes. And none of them did.

"ONE cold, wet night, her second in the city, she was staggering along Main Street, keeping close to the walls of buildings, because she knew she was going to fall pretty soon, when a hack came splashing down the street. You don't have hacks any more. Know what they were?"

I nodded.

"The hack drew in close to the curb and a tall, handsome young man leaped out. The girl collapsed in his arms, but she could still hear what he said. He was telling the driver that the girl was not drunk but ill, and that unless he missed his guess she was hungry. I was that girl, and Colonel Post was the handsome young man. I was very happy at the thought that he was going to take care of me. But he didn't. I saw him look at me appraisingly, and his verdict, as he afterward told me, was that I resembled a cross between an Indian famine victim and a drowned rat. No chance for romance. As I said before, you could scarcely imagine such an unpromising little wretch.

"'Take her home to your mother,' he said to the driver. And I saw him hand a bill up to the driver's seat. That was a blow. Tired and weak as I was, it was still possible to feel the hurt. I was so wet that I didn't dare even snuggle close to the handsome young man who sat beside me while the driver took me home. He didn't even say good night. The driver's mother fed me and put me to bed. Next day they told me who Colonel Post was and about themselves.

"They were very nice people; the mother was well educated, and her manners were far better than any I had ever seen before. Her son had once been a bookkeeper in the same newspaper office where Colonel Post was editor, but his health failed and he was told that he would have to work out of doors. He wasn't very strong, and that job of driving a hack was just about the only one he could hold, under the circumstances. He said it had saved his life. Colonel Post used to remain at his office until one o'clock every morning at that time and then drive to his club in a hack, the same hack every night. He and the driver were, in a way, good friends. He even came to their house on Thanksgiving Day and at Christmas time to have a piece of cake and a glass of wine with them. I hoped that he might come by to see how I was getting on, but he didn't. He made inquiry of the driver, and probably gave him another bill.

"I remained there, from day to day, intending to leave and afraid to start. The old mother needed me, because she was feeble, and heaven knows I needed her. One day the driver asked me to marry him. And I did. There didn't seem to be anything else to do. He was a kind man, and a weak, helpless creature like myself. It seemed natural for us to be together.

"BUT as I recovered from my fright and privations and became my normal self once more, all of the old dreams came back. I had but to shut my eyes, and I could see myself walking through marble corridors, carrying a feather fan, and trailing a long train of shiny silk. What was I doing? Where was I going? That was never part of the dream. There was very seldom a Prince Charming in these silly dreams. My highest ambition was to get over being a clodhopper dressed in an old flour sack.

"I told my mother-in-law about all this. I thought it would make her laugh. But it didn't. To my astonishment, she cried. I bless her memory for that. Oh, but it did me good! You see, I had been crushed. I had run away to become a queen, and I had nearly starved, and now I was married to a hack driver; but that good woman still thought the dreams were not silly.

"So we went to work together. The ice was broken. She showed me how to fix my hair, how to make my dresses fit. No matter how terrible they were, we made them fit beautifully. And I read books to her, while she corrected me. Then I would walk, up and down, up and down, trying to be graceful. We even danced together when she felt able. At other times I danced with the broom, miles and miles and miles. Every day at lunch she would be company and I would receive her at the front door. Nothing else interested me now. I didn't care for an audience, or for young men, or for anything in the world but to be a lady. I didn't try to sing or play the piano, and I had no hope of being an actress. All I wanted was to make my dream of myself come true. I could get on without the feather fan and the marble palace and the white horses. I wanted to be the sort of person who could make a little more stir than I had made by collapsing on the street.

"MY HUSBAND told Colonel Post what I was doing, and one day he dropped in. His manner was very formal. I didn't know why at the time, but he was furnishing me with a grand gentleman of the old school to practice on. I think it amused him very much. And, dear me, how I practiced, and how thrilling it was!

"That year, for Christmas, he gave us subscriptions to several women's magazines. That was the first time I knew such things existed. They opened half a dozen heavens for me. By the time my baby came I was the happiest woman in the world, because I had made with my own but for LIGHT, I use a flashlight. Particularly around the house where there's a chance of fire. I wouldn't use a lighted match among clothes in a dark closet or around the dry things in an attic, for anything. Not even if it was a good way to find things, which, you know, it isn't. I use my flashlight, an Eveready. Touch the switch and there's a big, bright circle of light that the darkest corner can't escape. Better light and SAFER.

There's no place like home for the flashlight habit. Keep Eveready Flashlights handy, upstairs and down. And keep them full of light, bright and long-lasting, with Eveready Batteries. They're packed with endurance, crammed with power, and they say it with LIGHT.

Lock out the thief that robs you of the heat you pay for..

PHONE your heating and plumbing contractor. Say: "Put my heating system in order, clean out the boiler—and show me how you can vacuum-ize my system with Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves."

He will tell you:—"Air and steam are mortal enemies. Air destroys steam, robs it of its heat. If air is in a radiator, steam cannot enter. Get that air out of a steam system, then lock it out—and steam won't have to fight every inch of its way into radiators, (pushing out the air, lifting its weight) every time drafts are opened.

"With air shut out, radiators fill with steam 15 minutes (instead of an hour) after drafts are opened. When the fire is banked radiators continue to give off heat for three hours (instead of 30 minutes), because air cannot get in to dissipate it."

What an inexpensive, almost magic way to keep homes warm and cozy, to keep fuel bills down to rock bottom!

Look up your heating and plumbing contractor now. Ask him about Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves on your heating system. You will thank him every frosty morning for his advice.

FREE BOOK, "How to Lock Out Air—The Heat Thief", tells clearly by word and picture the amazing story of Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves. Write your name and address on the margin and mail today. hands so many things for him that really were beautiful. Just learning to tie a pretty bowknot was a glorious achievement—for me. I spent months trying to set the table so that the things on it wouldn't look as though they had dropped through the roof.

"Sometimes I would go to the theatre, and there I watched every gesture, every step, and afterward I would practice the leading lady's speeches. Not the big dramatic scenes, but 'Come in, Gwendolyn,' or 'Good night, my dear,' or, 'Will you take sugar, Charles?' Those were the ones that interested me. I can't account for the long life of this enthusiasm, because we had no company and never expected to have any.

"About a year after my baby was born his grandmother died. She had saved a tiny little bit of money of her own, and she left it for me, with a note asking me to get a full-length mirror. We had talked of this before, but hesitated to spend the money. Now I got the mirror. Next, I borrowed a carpenter's plane and smoothed down two boards in the living-room and waxed the surface until it was like glass. Then I practiced walking on that narrow strip of imitation ballroom floor, watching myself in the mirror. It was very good practice too. I had to be graceful there or I would fall down. Being able to watch my reflection in the glass was the greatest help of all. Finally, I could detect a fault by the tiniest movement of the hem of my skirt.

"My husband was very good to me; these antics, to the extent that he knew anything about them, amused him; and when I wanted to spend money on little things for the house he always gave it to me if he had it. We didn't try to save. Most of the things I bought for the house were awful, as anyone might guess, and year after year I was getting rid of just about as much as I bought. Furnishing the house was the hardest lesson of all, because I hadn't seen many houses, and therefore pictures such as those in the magazines didn't mean as much to me as they probably did to others.

"WHILE my boy was in high school, my husband died. I went out to see if I could get work, sewing by the day. Well, I found jobs almost everywhere I went. There were no people around here, then; I went away over on the other side of the town. Nearly all of these people, my present neighbors, I mean, are newcomers. Colonel Post still continued to call three or four times a year, always on Thanksgiving Day and during the Christmas holidays. Sometimes he would send me a book, and he signed my library card, and gave me several lists of things to read.

"While the boy was in high school he won a prize, and Colonel Post presented it to him. Not long after that he came out and asked me if I didn't think the boy ought to go to college. I had supposed, of course, that that was utterly impossible; but he told me how young men worked their way through, and promised to give him a small allowance, to be repaid after he left school. We agreed on all this and my boy went East. He's doing fine there now. Just as soon as he was able, he repaid the money; but Colonel Post always objected to that, and said he should put the money in a special savings account, to be drawn on at some future time when he might find a boy he'd like to send to college. We referred to this money as the General Jackson Memorial University Fund. And he always called the boy young Stonewall."

"Why did he do that?" I asked.

"Because my husband's name was, of course, Jackson. Colonel Post always called him General, just as a joke. He called him General that night I met them. And I always called him 'General,' too. That amused Colonel Post very much, but 'General' was the first name I heard, and it stuck. In our correspondence this money was always the 'General Jackson Memorial University Fund,' and my boy was 'young Stonewall.'"

"Then your husband never was a general or any other grade of officer?"

"No. He was a hack driver. He wasn't old enough to fight in the war."

"Well, how did this story get started?"

"Just a few times, not over three or four at the most, I let my tongue slip and referred to him as 'General.' People didn't ask questions at the time, and I thought it was forgotten. Anyway, I think those slips occurred before my hair turned white, and nobody ever paid much attention to me then. You know there is a tradition in this town about two Mrs. Jacksons. No one knows what ever became of the one who used to work over on the other side of town. She just disappeared.

"WELL, the answer is that my hair turned white. And other things had happened, too. Evidently, nature had intended me to have a fair complexion; but fifteen years passed before the sunburn really all came out of it. As a girl I had a muddy, dismal complexion. It didn't entirely clear up until about the time my hair turned white. Then, of course, it showed to the very best possible advantage. These changes came within a few months, and suddenly I was a different person. Also, about that time The Heights began to develop rapidly, and I could get more business and better paying business within ten blocks of my home than there was to be found in all the rest of the city.

"Well, these people came pouring out here; nearly all of them recently from other cities and states, and they found a white-haired old lady living in an historic-looking rock house. They noticed that she knew how to sit down and get up, and walk and bow. Immediately, they began spinning romances about her. One day I went to Colonel Post and asked his advice. He said, 'Just keep that discreet mouth of yours nicely closed, as it has always been, and no harm will ever come of the rumors.' I thanked him with tears in my eyes, because I wanted to see the inside of all these pretty new houses. I wanted to see how these fresh, bright girls who came out of happy homes would go about making their homes attractive.

"You may know how eager I was to do this when I made bold to ask Colonel Post if he thought it was safe to let the dear, blessed rumor float on. I told him they were beginning to invite me to their parties. He said that if necessary he would swear that he and my husband fought side by side in every battle from Manassas to Appomattox. Colonel Post, you know, really was in the war, but the governor gave him his title, long afterward, he said, by making him a member of his staff. Certainly he looked like a colonel, and he could say the loveliest things. I must show you the last letter he sent me. It's nearly a year old, but I'll keep it as long as I live." She rose, opened a jewel box on a table near by, and produced the letter. I could see that there was nothing else in the box.

Colonel Post had written:

My dear Mrs. Jackson:

Young Stonewall persists in sending me instalments and you refuse to accept them, so I am angry with both of you. Christmas so near too! You shall have only this letter for a Christmas present. But I shall at least make it a pleasant one. I have for a long time now wished to pay you a compliment that you richly deserve. The little drowned rat at last holds her precious dream. The cocoon is forgotten, and you have bloomed in autumnal glory.

Madam, yours is the most remarkable achievement of fortitude, character and skill that has ever come under my observation. Words will not express the high esteem in which I hold you, for I, too, fall under your spell now, although I saw you weave with clumsy fingers its earliest strands and bowed my head to hide my pity. That any woman, regardless of her background, should be what you are today after years of constant poverty and hard work is an achievement of which the whole sex might well be proud.

But you have done more than that: you have wrought a miracle. God must have been watching you, for that silver crown of hair, I believe, is the harbinger of endless rewards. It was not solely for your sake, nor even because of friendship for the dear departed General that I promised my protection for the delightful rumor. I want these young women to know and admire and love you to their profit. You have been a good influence in every life you have touched. I want to save you for our town, as well as to stand guard so that you may have every possible moment of happiness in a triumph for which you worked thirty-five years. God bless you, and Merry Christmas.

Your humble admirer,
T. H. Post.

"Isn't that a nice letter?" she asked.

I nodded, and fished for my handkerchief, hoping—I am proud to say—that the seal would remain unbroken on this story, forever.

established a reputation, so, during the earlier years of my career, I accepted any and every commission that came along. I was never deterred from tackling a subject because I knew nothing of it. Instead, I went to a library and read up on it as though I were preparing for a college examination, then interviewed every available authority on that particular subject.

On what seemingly insignificant episodes do our actions, sometimes even our lives, depend. Missing a train, falling into conversation with a stranger, reading an item in a newspaper—any of these may set your feet on a trail which leads you know not whither. For example, I might never have gone to Abyssinia had it not been for an encounter with . . . I am getting ahead of my story.

steamer on which I had booked passage to India. Being in need of funds, I took my letter of credit to the office of Cowajee, Dinshaw and Company, the great firm of Parsee bankers who hold the I O U's of half the native rulers of the Near and Middle East.

As there was some delay in obtaining the currency in the denominations which I required, Mr. Dinshaw courteously suggested that I would find it more comfortable to wait in his private apartments, which, as is frequently the case in the East, were directly above the banking premises. Leading me up-stairs, he showed me into a large and luxuriously furnished drawing-room, the walls draped with rich Oriental hangings, the floor covered with priceless Persian carpets, the tables loaded with carved ivory, hand-wrought silver, and autographed pictures of the numerous sultans, emirs, and maharajahs whom he had befriended financially.

IT WAS a hot day, even for southern Arabia and, the doors and windows having been tightly closed at sunrise in order to keep out the heat, the atmosphere in the room was stifling. At length it grew so oppressive that I could endure it no longer. At one end of the room was a massive teakwood door, which, I judged, gave upon a balcony. Pushing back the ponderous bolt, I flung the door open—and received one of the shocks of my life. For on the other side of the threshold, not five feet away, stood a black-maned Nubian lion! For a long moment we eyed each other in mutual astonishment; then the king of the jungle let loose a roar which seemed to shake the house to its foundations. At the same moment I crashed shut the door and shot the bolt. As I did so, the lion hurled himself against it with an impact which made the stout panels quiver. Mr. Dinshaw hurried into the room.

"I hope Menelik didn't frighten you," he exclaimed remorsefully. "I forgot to tell you that we keep him on the balcony. He is as gentle as a kitten with the family, but he doesn't like strangers.

"He was presented to me when a cub," my host went on to explain, "by the Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia, for whom we arranged a small loan. He had the run of the whole house until quite recently; but he has grown so large that we have had to put him on the balcony because he was always breaking the chairs and tipping over the tables."

That evening it occurred to me that, if romance and adventure still existed anywhere in a world the place to seek them was in a land whose ruler presented those whom he wished to honor with living lions. The more I thought of it, the more the idea appealed to me, and ere many months had passed I was on my way to Abyssinia. It proved to be the most interesting and adventurous journey I have ever taken, and it was all due to my unexpected meeting with a lion.

One of the fascinations of being a free-lance writer is that you never know from day to day what interesting job is going to turn up next. One evening, for example, I was dining with some friends at the Bohemian Club in San Francisco. Among those at the table was the editor of a West Coast magazine. The conversation turned to the subject of motoring, and someone remarked the day would doubtless come when it would be possible to motor from Mexico to Alaska.

"I believe that it could be done now," I remarked rashly.

"If you want to try it," said the editor, "we'll commission you to do a series of articles, and pay your expenses."

I started the following June, using one of the first six-cylinder cars made in America. I had as a mechanic a young man from a Detroit automobile factory who could take down or assemble a motor in the dark. A California friend went along for the ride.

Had we listened to the calamity-howlers we never would have started, for they predicted every sort of disaster, from falling over a precipice to being lost in the snow.

The journey from Tia Juana, in Mexico, to Vancouver, in British Columbia, was quite uneventful, with passably good roads all the way. But the run up the Caribou Trail from Ashcroft to Quesnel was a moving panorama of frontier days.

At Quesnel, a settlement on the Upper Fraser, the road abruptly ended and our troubles began. Thence onward to the Alaskan border we did not average over twenty-five miles a day. Eventually even the miserable trail which we had been following died from sheer discouragement, after which we were compelled to depend upon the compass, sometimes chopping our way through the forest—we had had the foresight to add a French-Canadian axman to our party at Quesnel—and at other times digging the car out of seemingly bottomless bogs.

WE USUALLY slept in the open, wrapped in our blankets and ponchos, but one night, on the Blackwater, we found accommodation in a log cabin belonging to a titled English ranchman. The furniture had been made on the spot; the bedding consisted of Hudson Bay blankets and bear skins; the walls were papered with pictures torn from English illustrated weeklies. On a shelf was a pile of tattered magazines, some of them ten years old, and two books. One was "The Discourses of Epictetus;" the other "Social Manners and Usages."

Near Fort Fraser we ran out of gas, and our expedition would then and there have come to an inglorious end had not a trapper whom we chanced to meet told us of a drum of gasolene cached on the shores of a nearby lake. It had been brought into the wilderness by a couple of young English settlers, who had attempted to establish a motor-boat service, but who had met with financial disaster. From the owners I bought all the gas that we could carry for precisely what it had cost them to pack it in—three dollars a gallon. No wonder that they had gone into bankruptcy.

Crossing the Skeena at New Hazelton, we plunged into that wild and rugged region known as the Groundhog Country, and, after struggling through the precipitous defiles of the coastal range, saw lying below us the cold blue waters of the fiord which here forms the southern boundary of Alaska. I have never experienced a deeper thrill than at that moment. For, in the face of enormous difficulties,

Mellin's Food
A Milk Modifier

Building the Framework

In deciding upon the manner of preparing the diet for babies who must be bottle fed it is well to make sure that the material selected will furnish a good supply of mineral salts for building the framework of the body.

Mineral salts derived from wheat and barley are a part of the composition of Mellin's Food and these valuable constituents supplement the salts in cow's milk, with the result that food mixtures prepared from Mellin's Food and milk furnish mineral salts in an amount well calculated to meet every need for continued development of bone structure.

Babies who are fed upon cow's milk modified with Mellin's Food offer trustworthy evidence of receiving and appropriating these essential elements, for they show in every action of life the strength and good health that results from a sound foundation.

Mellin's Food Biscuits

Especially suitable when it becomes time to wean the baby from the bottle.

Charming Hair!

Now you can have it and keep it!

Your hair, soft, fragrant—lustrous! Alive with that youthful sparkle that everyone admires; having it and keeping it that way is largely a matter of proper shampooing.

Not just soap-and-water "washings", but the regular use of a shampoo that really beautifies—one that was created especially to improve dull hair and add that little something extra so often lacking!

If you really wish to make your hair bewitchingly lovely—just one Golden Glint Shampoo will show you the way! No other shampoo, anywhere, like it. Does more than merely cleanse the hair. There's a youth-imparting touch—a beauty specialist's secret in its formula. Millions use regularly. At your dealers', or send 25c to J. W. Kobi Co., Dept. K, 619 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wash.

we had accomplished what we had set out to do, and what everyone had prophesied was impossible: we had traversed the continent from Mexico to Alaska.

"WHAT was the closest call you have ever had?" my friends frequently ask me. To tell the truth, my life, though exciting enough, has been singularly free from narrow escapes and sudden jeopardies. Still, now that I stop to think about it, I did escape death by a very slender margin a few years ago in the Balkans. In company with an American friend, I was motoring from Paris to Persia. We had ferried the Danube at Rustchuk, crossed the Balkan Mountains in a driving hailstorm, dropped down to Stara Zagora, and were pressing on at top speed toward Adrianople. At this time Eastern Thrace was in dispute between the Greeks and the Bulgarians, their outposts being separated by the Maritza River.

Darkness had fallen when we reached the last Bulgarian outpost at Karmanlii, but as there were no accommodations available in the wretched little town we decided to push on. Just as we were leaving, the officer in command of the guard addressed some remark to us, evidently a warning of some sort, but as he spoke in Bulgarian we could not understand him.

From Karmanlii onward the road was tolerably good, as roads go in the Balkans, and, according to the map, perfectly straight; so our driver stepped on the gas and the big car hurtled forward, our headlights boring twin holes in the inky darkness. We had covered perhaps a dozen miles at reckless speed when, without the slightest warning, came the harsh command "Halt! Halt!" By way of emphasis, a tongue of flame spurted from the blackness and a rifle bullet sang a few inches above our heads.

The chauffeur jammed on both foot and emergency brakes with such suddenness that my friend and I, half asleep in the tonneau, were almost catapulted through the rear wind shield. The car swerved like a frightened horse, swayed until I thought it was going over, miraculously righted itself, and came to a standstill. As we tumbled out, a score of Greek soldiers rose from a ditch and covered us with their rifles. But it wasn't the menacing muzzles which left us limp and shaken. For the beams from our headlights, instead of illuminating a long, straight stretch of road, lost themselves in an inky abyss, from the depths of which rose faintly the sound of running water. And our front wheels were resting on the very brink of the abyss, which fell away as sheer as the side of a house. The Greeks had blown up the bridge across the Maritza. Another six inches and we would have plunged headlong into eternity.

OF THE numerous interviews I have had with the great ones of the earth, the one I had in the spring of 1922 with Mohammed VI, the last sultan of Turkey, was perhaps the most dramatic. The audience, which was obtained only after many delays and difficulties, took place in the palace of Yildiz Kiosk, that picturesque imperial residence built by Abdul-Hamid on a hill high above the Bosphorus. As the sultan spoke neither English nor French, and as I knew only a few words of Turkish, it was arranged that one of the imperial aids, who spoke English fluently, should act as interpreter.

After being conducted through an interminable series of corridors and anterooms, between lines of motionless Anatolian guardsmen and rows of eunuchs and chamberlains, who salaamed until their tarboosh-tassels almost swept the floor, I was ushered into an enormous reception-room. Its walls were covered with crimson damask; paintings of Turkish victories hung between the lofty windows; priceless Oriental carpets hid the polished floor.

From a desk at the far end of the room an elderly man, wearing the long gray overcoat and gold-laced astrachan cap of a Turkish field marshal, rose and advanced to receive me. A moment later I was shaking hands with his Imperial Majesty Mohammed VI, Emperor of the Ottomans, Khalif of Islam, Prince of True Believers, Vice-Regent of God on Earth.

He was very thin, almost emaciated, and his naturally sallow skin had an unhealthy pallor. His rapidly whitening hair and close-clipped, grizzled mustache gave him a venerable appearance; a pair of keen, intelligent eyes peered at me benevolently through thick-lensed glasses. Barring the uniform and the jeweled order which depended from his collar, he might have been a kindly old college professor.

"I am glad that you have come to see me," he said in Turkish, placing a hand upon my shoulder and pressing me into a chair. "I am a profound admirer of your great country."

This is not the place to repeat that conversation, which touched on Turkey's politics, and included a frank discussion of the exceedingly delicate Armenian problem. We talked for upward of an hour.

SUDDENLY, in the midst of a sentence, he ceased speaking; his hand went to his throat as though he were choking; he gasped for breath; his eyes became glassy; his cheeks, already pallid, turned the color of ashes. The aid, apparently overcome by panic, dashed precipitately from the room, leaving me alone with the sultan, whom I believed to be dying.

If the Commander of the Faithful, venerated by millions of Mohammedans as the head of their religion, was to be called to his fathers, as appeared imminent, I had no desire to be the only witness of his end. While I was chafing his hands and attempting to unhook his high military collar the aid returned, accompanied by one of the palace physicians. Under the influence of a powerful restorative, the monarch rapidly revived.

"His Majesty is subject to these attacks," the aid whispered reassuringly. "He suffers from an acute form of asthma, and when the seizures are exceptionally violent they affect his heart."

I was about to withdraw as unobtrusively as possible, but the sultan beckoned me to his side.

"They tell me that you are about to set out upon a long journey," he whispered weakly. "To parts of my empire which I shall never set eyes on. We are of different faiths, you and I, but, after all, there is only one God, and I pray, my son, that His blessing may go with you."

I have yet to find a Government which does not welcome favorable publicity, and which does not stand ready to afford reputable writers every facility in reason for observation and investigation. On occasion Governments have placed at my disposal warships, motor-cars, river steamers, airplanes, caravans, and even special trains. In 1919 I cruised from one end of the Adriatic to the other aboard a destroyer, which the Italian Government courteously placed at my disposition.

THE ease with which these extraordinary facilities can be obtained, particularly in lands where there are no congressmen or budget directors to ask embarrassing questions, is illustrated by my experience in the Philippines, which I visited at the suggestion of the then Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker. Shortly after our arrival at Manila the governor general, Burton Harrison, gave a dinner for Mrs. Powell and myself at Malacanan Palace. Seated at Mrs. Powell's right was Manuel Quezon, the brilliant young political leader; who was, and still is, president of the Philippine Senate; opposite her was Sergio Osmena, the speaker of the Lower House.

I had casually remarked, in the course of conversation, that after touring the islands of the American archipelago we purposed to visit the British and Dutch islands to the south.

"Why don't you let us place one of our coast guard cutters at your disposal?" suggested Mr. Quezon. "You will find it much more comfortable than the inter-island steamers."

"That is extremely kind of you," I replied, "but, you see, I am planning to go outside of Philippine territorial waters—to Borneo, the Celebes, Java, possibly to New Guinea."

"No matter," was the answer. "I'll give you a boat on which you can go where you please and keep as long as you please. She might as well be put to some use as to lie idle in the harbor."

"I hope you won't think me ungrateful or impertinent," I told him, "but may I ask if you have the authority to place a government vessel at my disposal for use outside the Philippines?"

"That can easily be arranged," replied Mr. Quezon. "After dinner we will go into the library and draft a bill giving me the necessary authority. Señor Osmena will introduce it in the Assembly tomorrow morning. I will see that it is passed by the Senate tomorrow afternoon. Governor General Harrison will sign it, and it will become a law by tea time."

And that is precisely what was done. A few days later we sailed out of Manila Bay aboard the "Negros" on a cruise which took us southward to the Banda Sea and westward to the Straits of Malacca. After six weeks I sent the cutter back to Manila from Singapore, because I was ashamed to keep her any longer. I am afraid, however, that I proved a great disappointment to my generous hosts, for in the book which I wrote shortly afterward I felt constrained to say that I did not consider the Filipinos qualified to govern themselves.

Some persons may take the view that it is unethical for a writer to accept favors from the Government of a country about which he intends to write; that in doing so he places himself under an implied obligation. With this point of view I do not agree. In a quarter of a century's experience, no government official has ever so much as hinted that I was expected to pay for any facilities which might be offered me, by praise, flattery, or whitewash.

I have found, in my dealings with foreigners, that a good deal depends on first impressions. By this I mean that the man who is well-dressed, dignified, and sure of himself is going to receive more consideration than the unkempt, boisterous, self-assertive individual. I recall one well-known American author who was invited to address the American Club of London. He had an important message to deliver, and he knew what he was talking about; but he failed to put his ideas across because he addressed the distinguished audience, which included several peers, two cabinet ministers, an ambassador, and several influential editors, as "you fellows." They resented what they considered undue familiarity.

The late Richard Harding Davis once told me that he always made it a point to be as well-dressed and as dignified as the other fellow, for the latter, knowing nothing of him, had to judge him by externals. A good deal of quiet fun was poked at the famous correspondent for the attention he paid to his personal appearance; but it was noticeable that, when the other correspondents were getting their meals as best they could, Davis was usually dining with the commander-in-chief.

AFTER reading thus far, you may have come to the conclusion that I lead a life of delightful ease, traveling whither I see fit and writing when the inspiration strikes me. I don't know how other authors plot out their lives, but I put in seven hours a day at the typewriter, not excepting Sundays, save, of course, when I am actually gathering material. I always write at sea and, when the conductor will permit and my fellow-passengers do not object to the click of the typewriter, on trains. I wrote one book, or dictated it rather, in a London hospital, and another on the deck of a little coasting steamer in the Indian Ocean. And once, in Florida, being unable to obtain a quiet room, I made an office of my car, and drove each morning to some secluded spot where I was safe from disturbance.

My home, as I have already intimated, is wherever I hang up my hat; my office wherever I open my typewriter. When in America I always endeavor to establish myself within easy access of a good library—the ideal one is, of course, the Library of Congress; but on my travels I have, perforce, to take my library with me. To meet this condition I have got together an equipment which is so compact that I can carry it in my car, in which, by the way, I do much of my traveling. It consists of a portable typewriter, a set of large-scale maps mounted on linen, a miniature encyclopedia, a dictionary, and a book of synonyms (these three printed on India paper), a Statesman's Year Book, the World Almanac, the Almanach de Gotha, Bradshaw's railway and steamship timetables, and the Bible. That is a pretty comprehensive outfit, when you stop to consider it, at least as far as my particular requirements are concerned. Set me down in the middle of the Sahara Desert, and I have at hand historical, scientific, political, and geographic references.

"YOU certainly have a pleasant life," my friends are forever telling me enviously. "Traveling all over the earth, meeting interesting people, seeing strange things. I'd like to trade places with you."

I wonder if they really would like my job if they had it, or if they would stick to it as long as I have. I wonder if they would be content to go for nearly thirty years without a home, without so much as a desk or chair which they could call their own. If they would consent to be separated from their children and their parents for months, sometimes for years, at a time. If they would be willing to spend two hundred and ten days in a single year, as I once did, on boats and trains. If they could accustom themselves to riding a camel for sixteen hours a day, for twenty days on end, with the mercury standing at 120°—and no shade.

If they would sleep without complaint in a palm-thatched hut in the heart of the African jungle, with huge bats hanging from the ceiling and the room alive with vermin, and lions making the night hideous with their roars. If they would actually enjoy life in a climate which is as hot and humid as the steam-room of a Turkish bath, where one's garments are a-sop with perspiration five minutes after they have been put on. If they would be satisfied to get along without newspapers or libraries or telephones or golf clubs or theatres or motion pictures or palatable food, or most of the other things which Americans take for granted.

If they would really be willing to exchange their sheltered, healthful, comfortable lives for existence in lands where to venture out of doors without a helmet is to invite death from sunstroke, where a drink of unboiled water frequently means typhoid, where the bite of a mosquito all too often means fever, the bite of a fly sleeping sickness, the bite of a flea typhus or bubonic plague. Ask yourself these questions in all seriousness before you envy me my job. It has not been all beer and skittles.

I never set out upon an expedition but I say to myself, "Well, when this trip is over I am going to buy a house in some tranquil community and settle down. I shall have a fireplace and an arm chair and a reading lamp which I can call my own, and I shall read all the books which I've never had time to read before, and play a little golf, and sometimes go fishing." I may buy the house ere long; in fact, I probably shall. But I doubt, in my heart, if I shall ever settle down until I am compelled to by old age. For the wanderlust has got me and will not let me be.

"TO GET THOROUGHLY MARRIED Takes Time and Trouble!" Who knows this better than a judge who has heard thousands of domestic suits? Who can explain the causes of happiness and unhappiness better than such a judge? Next month you are taken behind the court-room scenes, and Judge Raymond MacNeille, of Philadelphia, gives you, in a penetrating interview, some salty, inescapable facts about life and its tribulations.

know Rip Hanlon and Barney Lane are crooks. You're starting out on the easy-money trail. That's why I'm talking to you."

"But, Dad—"

"Don't interrupt. Please. Wait until I've finished. I've got a lot to tell you."

Hanvey watched spellbound as Roger Steele told his son the truth about himself. It was a grand and pitiful spectacle. A heart was laid bare—and tortured. The older man was cruel to himself. He told of what he had been: card-sharper, swindler, cheat! He painted a grim and ghastly picture; and through it all the lad sat forward in his chair, his boyish face tense with interest, his cheeks pallid.

And at length Roger Steele's story was concluded.

"That's all, son. I know I've dispelled a beautiful illusion, an illusion which meant even more to me than it did to you . . . because you always took it for granted. But I've put my head on the guillotine for your sake. I'm trying to save you from what I'm going through now. I'm trying to keep this agony out of your life. I've been everything that you are setting out to be. I've been a crook, and I've been successful. I've lived easily and well. And today . . . I have nothing. Just exactly nothing. Until a few moments ago, I had you. Now, I haven't. I—I don't want to get too sentimental, but I want you to make this sacrifice of mine worth while. You're clean now. Your word is good with me. I want your word, Ted, that you'll stay straight and decent. . . ." He paused awkwardly, then made a hopeless gesture. "That's all, son."

THERE was a strained silence. Then Ted Steele rose. Queer how much he resembled his father as he moved across the room and stood beside the broken old man. The boy's powerful arm dropped across the other's shoulder.

"You have my word of honor, Dad!"

Roger Steele whirled. He looked into the face of his boy and knew that he had won. There were tears in the eyes of Roger Steele, and he was not ashamed.

They said little more. Each of the three men knew that the clouds had been dispersed; the sacrifice had not been in vain. And finally Ted said that he must return to the office. He was going to notify Rip Hanlon and Barney Lane that he was through.

He left the room, and Jim Hanvey stepped into the corridor with him.

"Ted," he said, "I'm proud of you. You've done a big thing in a big way. . . . And even yet I don't think you quite appreciate all that it means to your father."

The boy nodded.

"Yes, I do, Mr. Hanvey," he answered quietly.

Ted stood silent for a minute.

"That was a brave thing my father did," he said suddenly. "It was wonderful. There were moments when I almost believed he was telling the truth!"

This time of year be extra careful

. . . protect your skin from dust

RIGHT now in the early fall, the dust blows in clouds. And dust—plain ordinary street-blown dust—is one thing that makes faces grow old. Because it grinds into the pores. Robs the skin of its natural moisture.

That's why the face is older than the shoulders. The face weathers, dries—through constant day-by-day exposure. The shoulders—protected—stay young.

Protect your face and it will stay as young too. You can do it easily—with Hinds Honey & Almond Cream.

Hinds Cream is the liquid cream with the heavenly almond fragrance. It sinks deep, deep—freshens the skin. Keeps it as sweetly soft as a baby's. It prevents dust-weathering—all weathering.

Just pat it on . . . the oftener the better. Especially before you go outdoors—pat it on as a powder base. But don't stop there. Pat it on at night. In the morning. Use it on your hands. (Marvelous for hands!)

Then your skin will stay soft, young, regardless of how much you are outdoors.

Try Hinds Cream. You can buy it anywhere. Or if you wish, we'll be glad to send you a free sample bottle. Just fill in the coupon and mail it to us today.

The Thing in Nature That Thrills Me Most

FIRST PRIZE

There is No Beauty for Me Like Dawn

THERE is a still and beautiful moment in that hour between darkness and daylight called "dawn." It is best described by the words, "holy, holy, holy," for in the faint coming outline of hill and tree one can almost imagine our Saviour leaving—before light shall discover Him—this earth He loved so well.

At this hour, it seems to me, readjustment takes place. It is the hour when man's pulse is low—when dreams bring back to us those gone on. The ship that carries our spirits to the far-away shore is in dock then—on schedule time. No matter what you are doing—plowing, motoring, camping, or looking out of your bedroom window—the world, with all its glare and noise, is far away. Only the earth, with its old, slow mission—birth—is here. Waiting. There is a hushed, vacant stillness. A cock crows in the distance. A cock crowed far back in that dark history, when Christ was a young man. We seem kin, our time and theirs, in that hour. As kin as though we felt the dust in us drawn by that of the earth. Man, as he is successful or a failure, brilliant or dul , is forgotten; but man, as he is bone of the earth, flesh of the earth, is remembered.

It seems to me that he who has lived through that hour is reborn. Purged to the finger tips, thrilled to the core, you feel part of everything. Kin! Before the first flickering glimmer of day, it has been told you, somehow, what God meant. Earth is under your feet, in your blood. Life has been explained, eternity assured. It has been like looking through a telescope to see the others who also lived and wondered.

Satisfied that what is is right, you tremble at the sweetness of that conviction, and turn with a feeling of triumph to stand at salute before the dawn of day. It is a glorious thing, this being given, again and again, another day! R. D.

SECOND PRIZE

I Love the Springtime in the Desert

CURVING shore, granite peak, pine-clad slope, foothills of the Sierra, gay with the carpet of spring: all glorious! But above and beyond all these, the desert.

Its silence, its vastness, its mystery, its lean and naked charm; the rose and opalescent hues of dawn, the shimmering heat of noonday, the glory of sunset, the mauve and purple shadows of twilight, the nights of black velvet, all buttoned with stars.

Away beyond our little cabin, perched like a bird on the barren hillside, stretched the desert plain, mile after mile; and away and beyond all this piled the desert mountains, range upon range. And when back of all this was spread the crimson and gold of the sunset, truly we knew then that "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Spring in the desert! Is there anything else so utterly lovely? Those few precious weeks when Nature, as if relenting her rigors, throws her jeweled mantle over hill and plain, and gay little blooms of every hue, born and gone in a day, dance in the soft breeze.

Desert nights! When the stars swing close and the moon rides shoulder-high. Many a mile have we ridden, star-guided through the darkness, stopping now and again to listen to the desert talk.

At first, life on this arid plain had seemed incredibly hard; its heat insufferable; its sudden and violent storms terrifying; its vast distances unbearably lonely.

But slowly it wove its charm. There was healing in its dry and pungent breath; fascination in its distances and mystery; challenge in its cruelty—cruelty that has left the bones of many pioneers, hardy men and brave, bleaching on its shifting sands. Its peace enfolds us like a garment; and the warm breath of the sage and chaparral spells home. A. W. C.

THIRD PRIZE

The Miracle of Growing Things is Most Enchanting

ONCE, when I was a child, I watched large black tadpoles, hatched from a jellylike mass of eggs, become green frogs and hop away out of the pan in which I kept them. I saw them swim about like flattened balls with tails. I saw four bumps appear where later legs began to grow. I watched their loss of tail and gain of legs. Then one day I saw them Frogs, and they were gone.

One time at school I watched a dry dwarfed bean, which the teacher soaked, swell until the tender leaves concealed within burst forth and sent up leafy shoots of green. I marveled at the powers held fast within that tiny seed, and wondered that so much of life could spring from such a source.

This morning, in an open meadow, I watched a jade spider with dusky velvet legs fasten a silvery web between two stems of yellow fall grass. The fall grass sparkled with dew, and the web was shimmery, like tranquil waters by moonlight.

So always it has been, that only in some quiet moment when I have watched some tiny thing of earth and marveled at its structure, the way it lived and breathed and grew and reproduced its kind, have I become conscious of the wonders of this world, of the beauty of life, and of a certain nearness of the Power which created it. So it is that a scarlet rose, a burly bee, a waving blade of grass, an anthill—the infinite detail of tiny things—is that in Nature which gives me my greatest thrill. A. C. S.

A Good Home

they told him that his father had gone back to Alabama. His lips quivered, and he had to frown very hard to keep from crying. Auntie Midge asked him to sit on her lap, and she told him that they all loved him very much, because his mother had been just like her own dear sister, just like another daughter to Aunt Elizabeth, and had lived with them until she went away to live with Daddy.

She told him he had come to stay with them a while so he could go to school, and learn to be the sort of boy Mum would want him to be. She said he would have a good home with them until he got big enough to go back and live with Daddy. She seemed to think all that ought to make him feel better.

But after a time he got a little used to being in this strange place. It was not like home. Even the grass was all cut short, without any daisies in it to pick. There were no dogs at all, nor any horses except the one Andrew used for mowing the lawn and going on errands to the village; when people went anywhere or came to see them, it was always in automobiles.

There were no houses very near, and the ones that could be seen at a distance were not at all the sort that colored people would live in. That was one of the surprising things the Tinker discovered—there were no colored people about the place at all, no little darkies to play with. Even Mary the cook, and Katie who waited on the table, and Signe who helped him get dressed, were white. He missed Aunt Sue a good deal.

He never quite got used to Aunt Elizabeth's white hair, and the very kind way she always spoke to him made him all still inside. She told him what to do, mostly; she didn't like little boys to ask questions, so when she was there he fell into the way of not talking at all unless someone spoke to him. Auntie Midge was nice; but she was very busy. When she was at home there were usually a lot of people with her.

ONE day he asked, "Where's all the little niggers, Auntie Midge? Ain't they any children to play with?"

Auntie Midge said, "Oh, goodness!" and made him ask it all over again c'rectly. But she hugged him, and said, "I suppose you do need some kiddies to play with, you poor baby. Never mind, it will soon be time for school to open. Then you'll drive off to school every morning, and you won't be lonely any more."

The next day a lady brought a little girl to see him; but she stuck out her tongue at him when her mother was not looking, and he found that he did not particularly care for her.

He rather liked the kitchen, though, and felt more at home there than in any other room of the house, and Mary liked him, and frequently gave him cakes. But Aunt Elizabeth discovered him there one day and led him away by the hand, and told him that nice little boys did not visit with servants. So sometimes he cried, after he was in bed, because he really did want to see Daddy and hear Aunt Sue comfortably scold, and feel Patch lick his face and snuggle down under the coverings.

Of course it was not long before he knew every corner of the place. There were not many interesting spots. There was a stable with plenty of stalls in it, but the only horse was that one Andrew used. There was another stable where the automobiles were kept. And of course there was the house itself. Andrew did not like him to help in the garden. On the whole, the best day he had since he came to live with Aunt Elizabeth was the day he discovered Clarence.

Andrew was not using the horse that day, and the Tinker was in the stable, rubbing its nose and feeding it bits of grass. There was a little barred window high up in the back wall; and suddenly something made him look up, and there was Clarence. It was the first brown face he had seen since he got off the train.

"Hi-yi!" said Clarence, all his teeth showing.

"Hi-yi!" said the Tinker, and grinned back. "Come on in!"

"Dassn't," said Clarence. "'Ey might ketch me!"

"Then I'll come out," said the Tinker.

THE stable was at the very end of the grounds; there was a tall wire fence, and a hedge in front of it, and beyond the fence a lane up which the grocer came and those other people who brought things to the back door of the house. And of course there was a gate.

The other boy was just about the Tinker's size; he was barefooted, and he had on a pair of trousers that had belonged to a much larger boy. They were, of course, cut off to a comfortable length—between knee and ankle, and they were upheld by a string across his shoulder.

"Hello," said the Tinker. "What's your name?"

"Name Cla-ence. W'at's yo'n?"

"Well, it's Robert, really; but you can call me Tinker. Where did you come from?"

"Who, me? I ain't come from now'eres. I's jest a-walkin' aroun'."

"I didn't know any colored people lived here," said the Tinker.

"I don' live here. I lives down in de village. Marma's a-workin' over in dat big white house over yondeh, how come I's here."

"Well, I'm very glad to see you," the Tinker assured him gravely. "You're the first little nigger I've seen since I got off the train."

Clarence's teeth flashed with delight. "Hi-yi! Lissen at him! Ef he don' talk like sho-nuff folks! Hi-yi!"

That was the first of many meetings they had, seated on the grassy edge of the lane behind the stable. The Tinker told Clarence all about home, all about the horses and Uncle Enos, and Aunt Sue and the puppies and Patch—especially Patch.

"'At ain't nothin'," said Clarence. "Ev'body's got a dog. I got a dog, my own se'f."

"What kind of a dog is he, a setter or a houn'-dog?"

"Sho, him's all kinds. Him's de best kind dey is. I'll give him to you. You kin have him."

"O-oh! I wish I could," said the Tinker wistfully.

So that evening he asked Auntie Midge, "Could I have a dog, please?"

He had tried to say it in a very low tone, but Aunt Elizabeth heard it and looked up from her book. "Oh, no, dear," she said, "you don't want a dog. You would get all dirty, playing with a dog. It might bite you, too."

He said, still in a very low tone, "But I wouldn't mind if it did bite me. It wouldn't mean any harm."

Auntie Midge smiled, but Aunt Elizabeth went on with her book. . . . That night he dreamed that Patch was licking his face. . . . And the next day Auntie Midge took him off driving with her, so he did not see Clarence at all.

A SHORT while after that, he came down to the breakfast table one fine morning to discover a little pile of bundles at his place.

"Many happy returns of your birthday, dear," Aunt Elizabeth said. "Open your gifts."

There were a pair of kid gloves, and a big picture book; and Daddy had sent him a baseball glove and seven new dimes.

"What do you say?" Aunt Elizabeth asked; but before he could say it, Auntie Midge told him he was going to have a party that afternoon. "You really have got to get acquainted with some children," she added.

"Oh! O-o-oh!" breathed the Tinker, his mind going back to his last birthday party. "Oh! Can I invite anybody I want to, to come to my party?"

Auntie Midge laughed again. "Of course! But I'm afraid you don't know many people, you lamb!" Then the telephone rang, and she went away, and the Tinker ran off to the stable. It seemed a long time before Clarence arrived.

"G'won, boy! I's colored," he said when the Tinker told him the news. "You cain't invite no colored boys to yo' party!"

But the Tinker told him all about his last birthday party, and finally Clarence said, "I reckon I could eat all de ice cream an' cake dey is in de worl'!"

AND yet, when the afternoon came, the Tinker forgot all about him for a time. He had to get dressed in a new suit, and put on new, shiny shoes; then Aunt Elizabeth told him he had better sit quietly beside her so that he would not get rumpled; and then the company came. There were a number of little girls in fluffy dresses, among them the one who had stuck out her tongue at him; and there were boys, who all wore shiny shoes like his. Most of the children brought gifts for his birthday, and he had to say to each one, "Thank you very much."

Then they were led out to the lawn to play games, while the mothers and Aunt Elizabeth sat on the porch and talked. It was when the children were seated in a ring on the grass playing Thimble, Thimble that the Tinker spied Clarence standing in the road beyond. The Tinker jumped up and ran down the drive. Clarence had a dog in his arms and was widely grinning, but looking a little scared.

"I done brung you a dog fo' yo' birfday present," he whispered loudly. "Got to let you keep yo' birfday present. Cain't make you give 'way yo' birfday present."

The Tinker took Clarence by the hand and led him in to the party. The little girls got up and clustered together, and stared.

"It's my friend Clarence," the Tinker told his guests. "He's brought me a dog for my birthday!"

The boys were interested. They gathered around Clarence and the dog. It was a medium-sized dog, yellow, with hair that was rather like a soft hairbrush; it had two small tufts of longer hair on its nose, like mustaches, and a rope around its neck. Its legs hung limply over Clarence's arm; then Clarence put it down on the grass.

"Gee!" said one of the boys, and Clarence, beaming, informed them, "Name W'iskers."

He pulled at the stump of the dog's tail, and suddenly it began to spin—'round and 'round and 'round, after that piece of tail. The boys shrieked with delight, and Clarence grinned and called:

"Ketch 'em, W'iskers! Ketch 'em, W'iskers!"

And the dog went 'round and 'round, stopped, staggered a little, and leaped at one of the little girls, who immediately ran shrieking toward the porch where the mothers were. But the Tinker plumped down on the grass and hugged Whiskers, who licked and licked at his face, and wriggled.

"Oh, thank you ever 'n' ever so much, Clarence," the Tinker said. "He's a perfectly beautiful dog!"

AND then, suddenly, Aunt Elizabeth and all the mothers were there. There was a good deal of talking; but the Tinker held Whiskers close—not that any of the mothers tried to touch him.

"What is this—this colored child doing here?" Aunt Elizabeth demanded.

"He's my friend Clarence. I asked Auntie Midge—she said I could invite anybody I wanted to," the Tinker explained, feeling for the first time that something was wrong.

"One does not invite colored children, Robert," Aunt Elizabeth began; but Clarence, who was still grinning, rubbed a foot against the back of a leg and said:

"I ain't come to no party, I ain't! I jest—I jest was a-comin' along."

"But we always invite all the little niggers to the party, Aunt Elizabeth," the Tinker said. "We give 'em ice cream and cake. And he brought me a dog—"

Auntie Midge had come running from the house. "What's all the excitement? Why"—her laugh bubbled, and some of the mothers joined in—"why, what on earth!"

The Tinker threw himself against her, dog and all. "Look! Look, Auntie Midge! He brought me a dog!"

"Why, so he did! At least—I think it's a dog! It is, isn't it?"

She and the mothers laughed some more, but Aunt Elizabeth said, "Margaret, tell that colored child to remove that dog at once!"

The Tinker gasped. "But it's my dog! He gave it to me! It's my birthday present! You can't give away your birthday present!"

"We cannot possibly have that dog here," Aunt Elizabeth said. "Give that dog back to that colored boy, Robert."

Sleepless Nights

How to End Them Without Drugs

—ALL-DAY ENERGY TOMORROW

Because Ovaltine is not a drug, but a unique food-drink; because it brings instant, all-night sleep that builds up tremendous energy for the next day—over 20,000 doctors endorse this natural way to healthful sleep.

Accept 3-Day Test—Not a Medicine; A Swiss Discovery Millions Are Using

Here is instant sleep, when you go to bed . . . sleep without drugs. A way, at last, of inducing sleep that any doctor you ask will approve.

A way that makes a new person of you tomorrow. For it does far more than merely bring you sleep. It rebuilds your wasted tissues while you sleep.

It's as free of drugs as the bread you eat or the milk you drink; as non-habit forming as warm milk. Thus it makes the use of drugs or soporifics a grave folly (unless under medical direction). People are flocking to its use.

Not A Medicine

It is called Ovaltine. A delicious food-drink. The discovery of a world-noted Swiss scientist. You take it at bed time. And soon you fall asleep.

Next morning you wake up feeling like a new person. For the peculiar dietetic property of Ovaltine re-supplies your system during the night with the energy lost the previous, active day. Builds you up and rejuvenates you.

Over 20,000 doctors are advising it. Its use has spread over some 50 different nations. New to America, it has been used over 30 years in Europe.

Acts This Way

Ovaltine acts on entirely different principles from sleep producing drugs.

Remember, it's not a medicine. It contains no drugs. It's a food.

Thus, you can take it night after night and not only avoid a habit, as with drugs, but build up your health as well. Instead of drugging your nerves to sleep, it acts to soothe you to sleep. For it corrects the digestive unrest to which most sleeplessness now is traced.

Ovaltine marks one of the most important scientific findings of its time. And must not be confused with "Malt" or "Chocolate" preparations which may claim the same effects or taste like it. It is widely different in formula and result.

Doctors advise it not only for sleeplessness, but for nerve-strain, malnutrition, general run down conditions, for nervous children, for nursing mothers, and the aged. Thousands take it to relieve fatigue during the day.

The Tinker began to howl. He hugged Whiskers; he yelled; he danced up and down. "No! No! It's my dog! It's my birthday present! You can't take away my birthday present!"

"Stop yelling, Bobby," said Auntie Midge. "Come with me—and bring Clarence with you. We'll give him some ice cream and cake."

So they took the dog down to the cellar, where it howled during all the rest of the party; and they fed Clarence in the kitchen. . . .

FORTUNATELY, Aunt Elizabeth had to hurry off to a committee meeting right after breakfast the next morning. The Tinker felt an atmosphere of strangeness at the table; he scowled, because he hadn't done anything. He heard Auntie Midge say as he came into the room:

"Now do let me manage this, Mother."

And after breakfast she went with him to the cellar, and they brought Whiskers up to the kitchen, and they fed him. He was exceedingly hungry, and when he got through eating he went nosing all over the kitchen floor looking for crumbs. Auntie Midge got hold of him at last, put a firm hand through his rope collar.

"Now listen, old man," she said. "We're going to take Whiskers down to the stable and put him in a nice box stall. You can take him his dinner, and you can take him some water, but you must not let him out of the stall. Auntie Midge is terribly busy today, but tomorrow we'll go off in the car, you and I, and we'll take Whiskers with us, and we'll find him a good home, out in the country somewhere."

"But Whiskers loves me," said the Tinker. "I don't b'lieve he'd like a good home, much. I think he'd rather live with me, 'cause he loves me."

They were already on the way to the stable. "Some day, when you're a big boy, you can have a real dog, Bobby. This isn't the kind of dog you'd want to keep, you know."

"He's my birthday present. You can't give away your birthday present. It—it would hurt Clarence's feelings."

"Clarence won't know," Auntie Midge said. "I explained to Clarence that he must not come back any more. Here in the North little boys do not play with colored children, Bobby lamb."

"But he's my friend," the Tinker explained, in a very weak voice. "And I—I don't want to play with him, 'specially. I—I just want to—talk with him."

"Well, he is not coming back any more. I've seen to that. Now, shut the door of the stall, Bobby. That's right."

POLITELY he watched Auntie Midge start her car; politely he waved after her. Everything felt very empty. His insides had not felt queer, like that, for some time. He went back toward the stable; Andrew was using the hose in the garden. He would have liked to help with the hose.

"If you let that dog get into my vegetables, Master Robert," said Andrew dourly, "there'll be what for to pay!"

The Tinker went on to the stable. There were no friendly sounds in it, as there were in the stable at home; only Whiskers was howling dismally. He slid into the box stall, and Whiskers jumped all over him, and wriggled, and jumped up again, and then went madly 'round and 'round after his tail. The Tinker dropped down on the straw. It was the most comforting moment he had known since the last time Patch snuggled down. . . .

He must have been sitting there quite a while. Whiskers was sound asleep, his chin over the Tinker's arm, when the boy became aware that someone was looking at him. From where he sat he could see a corner of the little barred window in the back wall of the stable. A brown face was there, and white teeth.

"Hi-yi!" came a sort of low explosion.

Slowly the Tinker grinned back. "Hi-yi!" he said, and Whiskers jumped up and wriggled the whole end of his body.

"How's W'iskers?" asked Clarence.

"He's very well, thank you. You wait, Clarence! I'm coming around!"

He did his best to open the stall door and keep Whiskers inside, but the dog was too much for him. Together they ran for the gate, together they reached the lane and the grassy bank back of the stable.

"Oh, Clarence, she said you weren't coming any more!"

"I ain't come anyw'eres," Clarence said airily. "I's jest out a-takin' a walk."

"They're going to make me take Whiskers away, tomorrow. They're going to take him to a good home."

"W'ere's 'at at?" asked Clarence.

The Tinker considered. "I don't exactly know. This is one."

"One w'at?"

"Why, this a good home. I've got a good home here; but I don't think Whiskers would care very much for a good home. I—I think he'd rather be where—where somebody—loves him."

"MAYBE kinder lonesome in a good home," said Clarence. The Tinker's face got red. He gulped, and nodded. "Maybe kinder ruther be where you is. Specially in de dark."

"Dogs like to get under the covers," said the Tinker, and began to cry.

Clarence was sympathetically silent for a time, then he said, "Maybe dey ain't like dis here one. Maybe all de good homes ain't. I got a good home, ma own se'f."

"Well, I—I got a home, too," the Tinker whispered. "I—I want to—to be there, right no-ow."

"Well, w'y ain't you, den?"

"Why ain't I what?"

"Why ain't you in yo' own home, 'stead o' dis here one, w'ere dey won't let you keep yo' own birfday present, huh?"

"It's ever and ever so far away from here. Me and Daddy went on a train. It was days and days."

"Ain't any train goes 'at long. You must a-went to sleep."

"Well, yes, I did," the Tinker agreed thoughtfully.

"W'en I wants to get home I jest goes home," said Clarence. "Ain't nobody gwine stop me! Why 'n' you jest go on home to yo' home?"

"It's awful far. We came on a train—"

"Reckon I kin walk as far as any ol' train can. Reckon ain't any ol' train couldn't keep me away from my home. W'en I wants to get home—"

The Tinker put the drowsy dog into Clarence's arms. "You hold him a minute, Clarence. I got to get something."

In a few minutes he was back, with his baseball glove and his seven new dimes. Without further words, they started.

It was late in the afternoon when they discovered they were rather tired of the woods. Whiskers was very wet from playing in a brook; they were scarcely less wet, themselves. Not long after they had started, they passed a wayside stand on the outskirts of the village, and spent five of the dimes for ice-cream cones and bananas. But the best of ice-cream cones will not nourish forever; by the time the sun went down behind the treetops and the woods were getting shadowy, they knew they were hungry.

"My marma gwine mix up some bread tonight," said Clarence. "Um-yum! Hot rolls! Um-yum!"

"With a chunk of butter in the middle," said the Tinker reminiscently. "Squshed down."

They walked and they walked and they walked. But not along the road. "Ef'n dey see you wid dat dog, maybe dey take him away f'om you," said Clarence; so they went across fields and by little paths, through back ways past the village, dodging over the railroad tracks, on to the ragged and untidy district beyond, and on and on over a dusty back road where there were few houses. It was dark before they came to Clarence's house, where a lamp shone from a back window. Clarence stopped.

"My marma done got home," said he. "My marma ain't set on W'iskers—how come I done give him away."

The Tinker said nothing; he was very tired, very hungry, and he felt a certain crisis in the air. It seemed as though the whole world were in a conspiracy to deprive him of Whiskers.

"Reckon you better wait here," said Clarence. "You hold on to W'iskers."

So the Tinker sat down, and held on to Whiskers, and waited; after a while Clarence came out with some fish and a boiled potato, and they ate.

"Reckon you-all kin sleep in de parlor," Clarence said when they were finished. "Got to wait out here tell Marma gets off. Lodge meetin' tonight."

But Whiskers was very restless, and carrying him between them they went to the henhouse. "A'n't any hens here. Us can wait here. Marma won't see him here," said Clarence.

AND the next thing the Tinker knew, Whiskers was scratching at him and barking, and the sun was streaming over him, and Clarence was there with his hands full of hot rolls.

"Marma left a big pan full," said Clarence. "And dey's plenty o' m'lasses. Um-yum!"

They had a wonderful day. They helped Whiskers hunt lions, and they played the henhouse was a cave. When they were hungry the first time, they ate the rest of the rolls; then they went for a walk in the woods and found another brook. When they were hungry the next time, Clarence took the rest of the dimes and went to the store, and brought back bananas and candy. Toward evening he said:

"Ef us gits home befo' Marma, you-all can sleep up in ma room. Marma don't ever go up to ma room."

So they set out for Clarence's house again, and just as they got in sight of it they had a big scare. There was an automobile there, and a policeman was knocking on the door.

"Ain't any ol' p'liceman gwine git me," said Clarence. They hid under a culvert until the policeman was gone.

This time Clarence's mother brought home some meat anc some grapes the lady she worked for had given her. Whiskers must have smelled the meat, because he refused to stay up-stairs, and the Tinker could hear Clarence's mother scolding.

"My land! Ef it ain't dat dog again! Ain't I done tol' you to get rid o' dat dog? How I gwine feed a dog, huh?"

"Ain't gwine git none o' my good roas' beef," said Clarence. "I's gwine take mine up to ma room and shut de do' on him!"

After supper Clarence's mother went off again. Clarence's bed was better than the henhouse; they giggled a good deal; Whiskers liked sleeping between them.

WHEN the Tinker woke up in the morning he thought he was back at Aunt Elizabeth's. He was sure he heard Auntie Midge's voice. He sat up and looked about him; then he knew where he was. She had come to take Whiskers away from him! He crept to the window and looked through the broken shutter. A big car was there, and a policeman; and, sure enough, there was Auntie Midge too.

"That's the dog! I'm sure that's the dog!" she was saying. "And that's the colored boy—Clarence! Isn't that your name, Clarence?"

He heard Clarence's leisurely answer: "Yas'm. Ma name Cla'ence. How's yo health to-day, ma'am?"

The policeman put his hand on Clarence's shoulder. "Look here now," he said roughly. "Where's the little boy that gave you that dog? Speak up."

"Clarence, oh, Clarence," said Auntie Midge—and she was almost crying—"have you seen Bobby? Have you seen him anywhere at all?"

"See him at de party," said Clarence.

"But since then? Clarence—look at me! Listen—Bobby is lost. We can't find him, Clarence! Have you seen anything of him? Do you know where he is?"

"Norm. I 'n't know w'ere he's at," Clarence lied nobly.

At that moment Clarence's mother came out to the yard. She listened to Auntie Midge, then she said, "No, ma'am, ain't been no little w'ite boy 'round here. 'At dog been follerin' us aroun' ever sence us come f'om Alabama. Ma'am? Lost? My, ain't dat too bad! Sho is! Yes, ma'am, I cert'n'y will let you-all know ef I sees anything of him."

Auntie Midge and the policeman got into the car and drove off, and soon Clarence's mother went off to work.

"Ain't got to tell de truf to white folks," said Clarence, when he and the Tinker were eating the breakfast left on the kitchen table. "Jest want to take ol' W'iskers away from you. 'At's all dey want."

"I reckon I'd better be getting on home," said the Tinker. "When I get him home, Daddy won't let anybody take him away from me."

So that day they walked a great deal. Of course there were many entertaining things to stop for, in the fields and the woods, and of course sometimes they stopped merely because they did not feel like walking on. Once they found some wild blackberries; it took them a long time to find enough.

Sometimes they came out on a road; they would dodge into the growth along the roadside whenever they saw a car coming. Once they were in a woods, and Whiskers had been digging frantically at a hole under a tree and the boys were whooping him on, and suddenly they heard men shouting, and Whiskers stopped digging and began to bark.

"He won't let no lions come git us," said Clarence. "P'licemen, neither." But, to make quite sure, they dived into a thicket of ferns and lay there hidden.

Some men came up. One of them said, "That's the same dog!" And another said, "There's someone in there!"

At that, Clarence rolled out of the ferns, and said, "Please, mister, don' take dat dog! 'At's my dog."

"What are you doing here with that dog?" the man asked, so crossly that the Tinker lay as still as a mouse. It seemed that everybody who saw poor Whiskers immediately got cross.

"I ain't doin' nothin', mister," said Clarence. "I's jest kinder lookin' aroun'."

"Have you seen anything of a little white boy, about as big as you are? Seen him in these woods, or anywhere else?"

The Tinker trembled; but Clarence said, "Ain't any w'ite boys in 'ese woods. Not in 'ese woods ain't any w'ite boys."

"There isn't a foot of the woods we haven't covered," another man said. "No use wasting time. . . ."

"Jest seem like eve'body set an' determin' take dat dog away f'om you," said Clarence, when the men had gone and the woods were still again.

But they thought they had better go on, so again they walked and walked and walked. By the time dark came, the Tinker thought they must have walked as far as the train went. It surprised him a good deal when all of a sudden they were at Clarence's house again.

Fortunately, Clarence's mother had left some supper on the table. . . .

WHEN the Tinker woke up the next morning there was the sound of cheerful singing outside the house. He peeked out of the window; there were two washtubs set on boxes out in the yard, and Clarence's mother was up to her elbows in suds, and was singing. Presently Clarence brought up some breakfast; then they did not know just what to do.

"My marma done tol' de w'ite lady she cert'n'y would let her know ef she see you. Cain't get out'n de yard 'thout she see you."

So they waited a while; but the singing and washing went on. Clarence brought some little white boxes with black dots on them, and showed the Tinker how to roll 'em; but it was not as pleasant up there as it was out of doors. It seemed a very long time that they waited; but as a matter of fact they had not begun to get hungry again when they heard a horn honking, and then a car came up and stopped. They heard someone say:

"The dog is the only clue we have, sir; and that is the dog."

"Ma land," whispered Clarence. "Lissen at 'em!"

It is so easy to check intestinal toxicity so dangerous to let it "drift along"

WE TALK a great deal about the "game of life." Indeed many of us live as though it were a game—a game of not too great importance, at that!

Nowhere do we show such carelessness as in matters of intestinal hygiene. Surely we have been told enough times about the dangers of intestinal toxicity! And yet, when we find headaches or "bilious attacks" or tired digestion warning us of an overburdened system, we are satisfied to take a pill and let it go at that until the "next time."

Why take such chances? Why permit poisons to endanger our entire system? It is so easy to combat intestinal toxicity. Thousands are doing it by perfectly natural means—a balanced diet, fresh air, exercise. If, in addition, a certain degree of assistance is necessary, why not trust yourself to the gentle, thorough action of Eno instead of using bitter, drastic cathartics?

Perhaps you have tried this delightful, sparkling laxative . . . and already know of its pleasant taste and gentle, thorough action . . . how different it is from the ordinary cathartic.

Women, particularly, like Eno's Effervescent Saline. One reason is that it never leaves you "all dragged out." It simply flushes and cleanses the whole intestinal tract and speeds up normal action. And so it does not gripe you nor disturb the day's routine.

Try Eno for a week—every morning or evening. You will give it a constant place on your bathroom shelf when you have once experienced the keen, clear-eyed health that is possible for those free from the absorption of intestinal toxins—poisons carried by the blood stream to all parts of the body—that rob us of energy and strength.

This famous effervescent saline is available at all druggists. It costs only 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd., London, England. Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., Belmont Building, Madison Avenue at 34th Street, New York.

Eno — health precaution—will cost you less than 3c a day.

When you get up, simply take a glass of water and add a generous teaspoonful of Eno. Taking this sparkling, delightful saline regularly will help to keep you fit and eager throughout the hardest day.

For a business headache, nothing is better than a glass of Eno. You can get it at the better soda fountains everywhere.

They crept to the window and peeked through the broken shutter; but the people had got out of the car and were standing where they could not be seen. Clarence's mother was talking:

"No, suh, I ain't seen hide nor hair of 'im. 'At ain't his dog, suh. 'At dog done follered me 'n' Cla'ence aroun' ever sence us come f'om Alabama. Yes, suh, sho' is a shame. Ev'body in de whole place talkin' about it. Say dey gwine drag de ponds today."

One of the men made a queer sound, and another said something the boys did not hear; the woman said again, "No suh, I's tellin' de truf. 'At ain't his dog. I knows 'at ain't his dog, suh. 'At dog done follered us aroun' ever sence us—"

One of the men had moved out toward the car, and suddenly the Tinker shrieked:

"Daddy—it's my Daddy—!"

NO ONE ever remembered how he got down the stairs and into his father's arms. The Tinker himself only knew that after a while his father was sitting on the step of the car and holding him tight, and saying over and over:

"Tinker—my little son—old Tinker! Why did you do it? Old Tinker—my little son—"

"He's my dog, Daddy," he explained through his sobs; "he's my own dog! He's my birthday present, Daddy! Don't let them take away my birthday present, Daddy!"

"Of course he's yours, old Tinker!" Daddy's face was all wet. "Who wants to take him away from you?"

"They want to take him to a good home, Daddy! I—I don't think he'd like a . . . good home. Aunt Elizabeth's is a . . . good home—"

One of the other men had hold of Clarence's mother. "Le' go o' me, man," she was saying. "Le' go o' me! Ma lord, ef I ain't gwine lick dat Cla'ence! You le' me git at him! Le' go o' me!"

"Come here, Clarence," said Daddy, and Clarence came up, grinning. "Now—tell me about it."

"Ain't nothin' to tell," said Clarence cheerfully, standing on one foot and rubbing the other against his leg. "W'en I wants to git home, I jest goes home."

"I'm beginning to see," said Daddy. "Was that what you were trying to do, old Tinker? Were you trying to go—home?"

The Tinker nodded, and shrank closer to his father. "You can't give away your birthday present, Daddy," said he. "My friend Clarence, he said, when you want to get home, you just—go home."

"I think I understand," said Daddy; and, to the men, "I guess this was not a case of kidnapping."

"Kidnappin'!" cried Clarence's mother. "Who done say kidnappin'?"

"Better let her alone," said Daddy, and the man took his hand away from the woman.

"I craves to get ma han' on dat boy!" she said, making a dive for Clarence; but Clarence was not where he had been a moment before.

"Stop that!" said Daddy, and the woman stopped. "Let the boy alone! Did I hear you say you came from Alabama?"

"Sure did, suh. An' de good Lord knows why I done it. 'It ain't no place for a 'spectable colored woman. 'Cusin' me o' kidnappin'! Huh! Jest le' me get ma han' on dat Cla'ence—"

"I DON'T think you need whip him," said Daddy. "How would you like to go back to Alabama with us, you and Clarence? And Whiskers," he added, as the Tinker's arm tightened about his neck. "We owe you all a good deal, the Tinker and I."

"Me, suh? Go back home to Alabama? Ma lordy, suh—show me de way!"

And said Clarence, grinning, "W'en I wants to git home, I jest goes home! 'At's what I done tol' him. I says w'en you wants to git home, you jest goes home!"

"Not to—a good home, Daddy," the Tinker begged. "Just—our own home."

And Daddy held him very tight. "We'll get along somehow, old Tinker," he said. "We'll have teachers, or manage some way. I guess that's the best home—our own home."

And the Tinker laughed. "I reckon Whiskers'll like it," said he.

needed assistance in making harbor. The steamer asked us to relieve her of the schooner, and indicated her position.

"The 'Manning' immediately laid course to intercept the vessel, and shortly after dark we came up to her. We drew alongside, and with our searchlight playing on the schooner shot a line to her and passed a hawser on board.

"The master of the 'Virginia' was a Spaniard and could speak no English, so I called up our Spanish fireman to act as interpreter. The master said, 'We're all right now, but tow us slowly.'

"So we started back toward Norfolk at slow speed, the schooner following us about two hundred and fifty feet behind. It is necessary to give a long tow line at sea, to allow plenty of slack for the give and take of the swell.

"WE BEGAN our tow at eight o'clock, and before midnight wind and sea had risen to quite a squall. The darkness was thick—not a star in sight.

"Shortly before midnight I saw a flash of light from the schooner, which we understood as a signal to slow down. We reduced speed to bare steerageway, and threw our searchlight on the 'Virginia.' No further signals were seen, and it was impossible in that sea to attempt any conversation. The schooner had no radio. We proceeded at a snail's pace, turning on the searchlight at intervals to make sure that all was well.

"Early in the morning the tow line parted at the schooner, sawed in two by the continuous chafing. We hauled the hawser aboard, and again examined the 'Virginia' by searchlight. She showed no sign of distress, but was wallowing in heavy seas. We stood by, with our searchlight in action every few minutes until dawn.

"As soon as it was light enough to see, the 'Manning' took a position parallel with the schooner on her starboard side, prepared to put a hawser on by means of a shoulder gun. As our gunner was making ready, we saw a sudden commotion on board the 'Virginia.' Several men ran to the stern, as in a panic, and a boat was being lowered over the side. Hardly had it touched water when the schooner suddenly settled by the head and rolled hard over to port. A few seconds later she went down.

"We steamed the 'Manning' as rapidly as we could to the spot, heaving lines and throwing life buoys and paying out two life rafts over the rail. The water seemed full of bobbing heads of struggling men, and I was astonished to see that most of them were Chinese. Some were clinging to pieces of wreckage; but the sea was very high, and it seemed impossible that any human strength could last long in such rough, icy waters.

"We rescued seven men—five of the crew and two Chinese passengers. The cook and sixteen Chinese drowned. The master of the schooner, although he was undoubtedly a Chinese smuggler, proved to be a man of courage and sacrifice. While he was struggling to keep afloat, a line was hove from the 'Manning,' and he caught it. But he gave it to one of the young members of his crew, and took his chance on another line reaching him. Eventually we got a life buoy to him, and hauled him aboard.

"The master claimed that the Chinese were stowaways, who hid in the hold while he was moored at Matanzas, Cuba, and were not discovered until he was four days at sea. It was the presence of these contraband passengers that prevented his reporting the real condition of his ship when first we took it in tow. The truth is that the schooner was badly strained by the gales, and was in a leaking condition. If we had known, we would have transferred all hands to the 'Manning'—something that a smuggler naturally wanted to avoid, and he hoped against hope that we'd succeed in towing him in before she sank."

THE saddest tales of Hatteras are those that are most meager—an empty lifeboat found afloat, a drifting spar or the smashed bit of a hatchway, an abandoned derelict. Sometimes the S O S call is never completed. Sometimes it crackles once, despairingly, never to be repeated. The sea is a wilderness as well as a highway, and ships occasionally are lost without trace.

The steamship "Loyal Citizen" went down in the September storm of 1926, leaving no sign but a capsized lifeboat. The "Santiago," with a cargo of sugar and a crew of forty-four men, foundered a few miles below Hatteras in a northeast gale of March, 1924. Ten men in a lifeboat got away safely, but the "Manning" combed

The clerk whose name will live forever

TWO MEN lived in the same town a century ago; they knew the same people and had an equal chance in life.

One spent all his spare hours in idle talk or with the daily paper; he knew nothing beyond the day's news. The other brought to every subject a wealth of sidelight and illustration that kindled the interest of men and women, no matter where he went.

The name of the first man has long since been forgotten; the name of the other, the humble clerk in a country store, will live forever.

He talked like a man who had travelled, though his travels were confined to a few backwoods counties. He knew something of history and biography, of the work of great philosophers, poets and dramatists.

His Secret Given to You

What was the secret of his wide range of knowledge? How can a man who must work every day in a routine job find time to make himself so interesting to other men and women?

The answer is found in every biography, every anecdote of that greatest clerk. He owned a few great books and, in the odd moments between customers' calls, he read them systematically. It was the influence of those books that gave his mind its start; then lifted his eyes beyond the horizon of a backwoods town. Before he was fifty, the whole nation knew the name and acknowledged the power of that humble, unschooled man. His name was Abraham Lincoln.

What are the few great mind-building books? There is no more important question for you to ask yourself. It is answered in the free book that tells the scope and plan of Dr. Eliot, from his lifetime of training men for success—forty years as President of Harvard—selected the few great books that contain the essentials of all books—the "essentials," as he says, "of a liberal education."

Your Reading Problem Solved by Dr. Eliot

Discarding all the books that waste your time, he combined these few great volumes together into a rounded library; he arranged them with reading courses and footnotes so that even in 15 minutes of pleasant reading a day a man may master them.

Think of it—the knowledge of literature and life, the broad cultural viewpoint that every university strives to give—these may be yours in the pleasant spare moments of your active days. Make yourself a bigger, more interesting man or woman this year. Send for "Fifteen Minutes a Day."

"For me," wrote one man who had sent in the coupon, "your little free book meant a big step forward, and it showed me besides the way to a vast new world of pleasure."

Every reader of this page is invited to have a copy of this handsome and entertaining little book.

Reading is an essential part of every human life, and good books make the best reading. Since 1875, P. F. Collier & Son Company has not only published good books, but has brought them within reach of all by the Collier plan, which enables you to pay for them while you are enjoying them.

the seas four days for the other lifeboats, and never found trace of them, or of their thirty-four shipwrecked refugees! More often it is a schooner—like the "Deering," which stranded on Diamond Shoals in the summer of 1921; all hands were lost, presumably through the capsizing of lifeboats.

"The first and fatal impulse of men whose vessel is stranded at Diamond Shoals," said Captain Philip H. Scott, who was in command of the "Manning" at that time, "is to abandon ship. And when this has to be done in a motor-boat that must be lowered, with all hands in it, over the high stern of a grounded schooner, and broadside to the seas which are driving her on the shoal, the chance that anyone will live to tell the tale is not one in a thousand. In 1915, in the same locality in which the 'Deering' foundered, two schooners were lost, and not a word was ever heard of the crew of either."

Fog adds terror to the usual risks of the sea, shrouding the warning lights of Hatteras and Diamond Shoals in its thick cloak. Sometimes it is a driving snowstorm that makes the "Manning's" work more difficult, as was the case in January, 1927, in the rescue of the "Tuxpanoil." With engines broken down this big tank ship lay helpless off Bodie Island, just north of Hatteras, when the distress call reached the "Manning." The cutter literally "cut" her way through a blinding snow to reach the disabled vessel, guided by her radio compass. Frozen rigging, slippery decks, frost-stiffened hawsers, and the lashing of icy seas make winter rescues a severe test of human endurance as well as of seamanship. Sometimes the "Manning" comes home to Norfolk coated with snow and festooned with icicles more suggestive of the Arctic than of its patrol off the Gulf Stream.

DANGEROUS in a different way is fire, and the "Manning" has had her full share of fighting it. One of the most spectacular fires in its waters in recent years, was the burning of the coal ship "Buttonwood." This occurred off Thimble Shoals, on February 1st, 1923. A passing steamship discovered the fire at midnight, broadcast it by radio, and the "Manning" quickly steamed to the reported position. She needed no radio compass to locate this wreck—its pillar of fire illuminated the water for miles.

"On arriving, we saw at once that the 'Buttonwood' had been abandoned," said Captain Scott. "Her house amidships had already gone up in smoke, leaving a tangled mass of red-hot iron that had been her machinery. Through these ruins long flames fought upward. Forward and aft the decks and bulwarks were blazing, and the afterhouse was smoking at every outlet."

As the "Manning" drew near, the roar of the burning ship was like that of a furnace under a draft. Flames crackled and licked out at the sea as though they defied the very nature of water, hissing and steaming as an occasional wave struck the wreck and sent its salt spray into the fire.

For thirteen hours officers and men of the "Manning" fought this blazing derelict. The "Buttonwood's" cargo was on fire; and the cargo consisted of several thousand tons of bituminous coal. The men cut holes in the deck to get streams of water to the smoldering coal. They hacked out a section of deck wide enough to admit a man, and one of the crew descended into that inferno and directed a stream on the burning under side of the deck and beams. The fight had to be waged against smoke, steam, poisonous fumes of coal gas, and exploding barrels of oil in the hold. The characteristic "Manning" luck held, and the crew came through this sizzling ordeal without serious injury. With the help of the naval minesweeper "Owl" the "Manning" finally got the still burning "Buttonwood" out of the channel into the shoals off Lynnhaven Inlet. One half of the cargo was later salvaged by the owners.

PERHAPS the most memorable voyage of the "Manning" was her trip from New York to San Francisco in 1900. There was no Panama Canal then, and the only way was around the Horn, and up the Pacific, a voyage of 15,016 miles, which the cutter performed in ninety-six days. Arrived at San Francisco, she was assigned to cruising duty in the North Pacific and in Bering Sea.

For the next sixteen years the "Manning" continued to patrol Pacific and Alaskan waters, and was a familiar and welcome visitor to the fishing villages and other remote habitations of our far northern territory. To many isolated settlements it was their only link with civilization, bringing the kindly ministry of medicine, the protection of the law, and news of the outside world.

"Sometimes," said a "Manning" officer, "it was a shipwrecked crew to be rescued. Sometimes it was a sick person to be relieved, a frostbitten finger to be amputated, an epidemic to be fought.

"Sometimes it was crime that had to be punished and justice administered. I remember one occasion when we landed our crew on Unimak Island, trailed a murderer to a fishing camp, seized him, and brought him back to Unalaska for trial.

"Sometimes it was a volcano that had to be endured."

And this brings up the occurrence of June 6th, 1912, a day which will forever be a red-letter date in the log book of the "Manning."

Around noon of that day a tug lay in Karluk Harbor on the west coast of Kodiak Island. Suddenly her captain felt a shock, as though his vessel had hit bottom, and at the same moment he saw the peak of a mountain blow off in a gigantic explosion.

"It was like a big bomb," he said later, describing the spectacle. "The whole top of the mountain shot straight up with the speed of lightning, and then the thing spread out into a dense cloud, like an exploding smoke bomb."

This was the beginning of the most tremendous volcanic eruption on the North American continent within historical times. The sound of its blast was heard down the coast as far as Juneau, seven hundred and fifty miles away. Scores of places were disturbed by the earthquake which accompanied the eruption. Volcanic ash and dust were carried by the upper winds thousands of miles. It is no wonder that in the immediate neighborhood of the eruption people were terrorized; and the need for means of rescue and for men of courage and leadership was imperative.

In other words, there was immediate need for just such an outfit as the "Manning" and her crew—and, as luck would have it, the "Manning" was there, right in the neighborhood!

At the moment when the volcano burst, she was coaling at the town of Kodiak, on the east side of Kodiak Island.

"Curiously, we heard no explosion at Kodiak," said Lieutenant Commander W. K. Thompson, who was navigator of the "Manning" on this cruise. "High hills and mountains lay between us and the volcano, and we knew nothing of the occurrence until mid-afternoon, when the air gradually filled with a faint haze and a delicate powdery ash began to fall.

"At five o'clock we were gathering specimens of it, as souvenirs. By eight o'clock it was falling heavily, thicker than any snowstorm you ever saw. Normally in that latitude, we would have good daylight until eleven P. M., but by nine o'clock darkness had fallen, and by ten the blackness was dense. From the deck of the 'Manning' you couldn't see the light up above on the jack-staff, and our searchlight wouldn't penetrate thirty feet."

NEXT morning at nine-thirty the fall of volcanic matter ceased, and everybody cheered up. Men from the "Manning" were detailed to inspect conditions in the town, and found all wells and streams choked with the volcanic deposits. Captain Perry, commander of the "Manning," started the ship's evaporators to provide fresh water for the community, and they were in almost continuous operation for the next week. A few people from Kodiak had taken refuge on the cutter the night before. Everyone was wondering which of Alaska's numerous volcanoes had caused the mess. Heavy static rendered the "Manning's" wireless plant dumb, and no word had been received from outside. However, it was expected that the ether would soon clear, now that the eruption was over.

"Over? It had hardly begun," said Lieutenant Commander Thompson, "for at noon the fall of ash resumed, by twelve-thirty night had set in again. More people from the town were sheltered on the 'Manning' that night, but few slept. It was only by our clocks that we knew when another day had dawned. Avalanches of ashes could be heard sliding down the neighboring hills with a thundering crash which sent forth suffocating clouds. Sulphur fumes impregnated the air, so stifling at times that it seemed the next breath would surely be the last.

"One cannot talk about this experience without repeatedly recalling the intense darkness. It was so thick that men bumped into one another as they worked on deck. The ship's electric lights looked like tiny glowworms, and it was sometimes difficult to see the light of a lantern at arm's length. We were continually shoveling and sweeping off the ashes, and kept four streams of water washing the decks; but they made no permanent impression."

On the third day of the eruption, Captain Perry commandeered the storehouse on the wharf, and, with the aid of the Russian priest, he mobilized there almost the entire population of the town. On the "Manning" 185 of these refugees were sheltered; in the storehouse, 149.

"During the morning," said Lieutenant Commander Thompson, "we discovered that seven members of the tug 'Redondo' had failed to reach the village. Presumably they were cut off at the cannery, half a mile away. I called for volunteers and selected eight men. Then I went to Captain Perry and told him that we were willing to try a rescue, and awaited his orders.

"He replied that he didn't dare give orders for that piece of business; but that if we wanted to make the attempt we had his permission.

"WE SET out immediately. We had already provided guide ropes, a compass, lanterns, and other equipment. We proceeded across the village and down the beach to the west.

"The ashes had drifted many feet high in places, and it was necessary to wade through, roped together like mountain climbers. Not only were there these drifts, but every now and then an avalanche would charge down the hills back of the village, sweeping everything before it. Many times we were grazed by these ash slides, and one big one caught us, and knocked down our middle men. But the ropes around their waists held, and we were able to pull them up quickly.

"Our compass was erratic, and proved useless. We simply had to depend on our sense of direction to push ahead.

"After following the beach for some distance, and shouting at frequent intervals, we raised the 'Redondo.' The crew halloed back, and we told them to launch their boat. When this was done, we directed them to the beach by repeated calls. Upon their landing we roped the seven men into our party, and struggled back to the 'Manning' through the drifts and avalanches."

(In his official communication to headquarters in Washington Captain Perry reported this rescue, with the following comment: "A heroic act, deserving of the highest commendation.")

"Meanwhile officers and men from other vessels in the harbor took refuge on board the 'Manning' and helped in the work. The school-teachers and other white women of the village nursed the sick and served coffee and food.

"Around two-thirty in the afternoon," continued Lieutenant Commander Thompson, "the fall of ashes began to slacken, and presently the skies assumed a reddish hue. Objects became dimly visible. Captain Perry called a consultation, and it was decided that here was our chance. To stay might mean death, when the volcano resumed. Though the neck of the harbor was exceedingly dangerous to navigate in dim light with all landmarks obliterated, still, it seemed to offer our best opportunity of escape.

"All hands were taken on board, and at five-thirty P. M. the 'Manning' cast off. With two leads going and an old Kodiak pilot at the wheel, she made her way through the narrow channel into the outer harbor. There we anchored, figuring that if the eruption resumed, we could pick up quickly and stand out to sea.

"Soon after we anchored, a motorboat brought an additional 103 refugees. Many were in need of doctor's attention, and all were suffering from lack of water. We served meals that day to 486 persons in addition to our own crew. We furnished quarters for 414 of them, the remaining 72 being sheltered on the tug 'Printer,' which was moored alongside the 'Manning'.

"Of course we were crowded. The 'Manning' has regular quarters for 76 men, and to accommodate 414 additional meant some squeezing. The crew gave up their quarters to the women and children, and the men slept where they could, on the quarterdeck, the hurricane deck, up in the pilot-house.

"The morning of Sunday brought dawn —a gray haze, and no more ashes. Seemingly, the eruption was at an end. All hands turned out early, clearing off decks and tidying up quarters."

A baby had been born on board that night, and an elderly woman was desperately ill. She died before the day was over, the only casualty. In the afternoon the "Manning" returned to the inner harbor and gradually landed all the refugees.

Several houses had been demolished in Kodiak by the avalanches of ashes Captain Perry felt anxiety for other settlements, and on Monday commandeered the tug "Redondo," stocked it with water and rations, and dispatched it on a cruise around the island, in charge of Lieutenant Commander Thompson.

"I found conditions in the other villages much the same as those we had at Kodiak," said Lieutenant Commander Thompson. "Arriving on the northern side of the island, we saw Shelikof Strait afloat with great drifts of exploded pumice, as light as foam.

"Here, too, we learned that the cause of all our troubles was Mount Katmai, of the Alaska Peninsula. None of us had guessed that it was the disturber; it had never shown any volcanic symptoms and was regarded as of so little importance, in fact, that it was not listed by name on the charts. But Katmai is on the map now!

"WE PROCEEDED in our tug to the next island northwest of Kodiak, to the village of Afognak. There we met a lone native who had paddled his bidarke (skin boat) through the floating fields of pumice, across Shelikof Strait, to bring a message from Douglas Village on the peninsula.

"It was written on a soiled piece of brown wrapping paper, scrawled in Russian with a blunt pencil. The Afognak trader's wife could read Russian, and she translated it."

And here is this message as the trader's wife translated it. The writer was an Afognak man who was caught in Douglas by the eruption. Written as a fond farewell, it gives a vivid picture of an eyewitness's impression:

MY DEAR WIFE TANIA: First of all, I will let you know of our unlucky voyage. I do not know whether we shall be either alive or well. We are awaiting death at any moment. Of course do not be alarmed. A mountain has burst near here, so that we are covered with ashes, in some places 10 feet and 6 feet deep. All this began on the sixth of June. Night and day we light lamps. We cannot see the daylight. It is terrible, and we are expecting death at any moment, and we have no water. All the rivers are covered with ashes. Just ashes mixed with water. Here are darkness and hell, thunder and noise. I do not know whether it is day or night. Vanka will tell you all about it. So, kissing and blessing you both, good-by. Forgive me. Perhaps we shall see each other again. God is merciful. Pray for us.

Your husband, IVAN ORLOFF

The earth is trembling. It lightnings every minute. It is terrible. We are praying.

When Lieutenant Commander Thompson and his crew reached Douglas Village that afternoon, they were able to appreciate the point of view of the impressionable Ivan.

"From this village we could see Mount Katmai. Long streaks of lightning were flashing into its crater, accompanied by terrifying claps of thunder. And, not to be outdone by the commotion in the air, the ground beneath our feet jazzed in frequent earthquakes."

The "Manning" spent a month in the neighborhood of the volcano, picked up natives who had abandoned their homes, and established a new village at Three Stars Point, which was renamed, in honor of the Captain, Perryville. Thus ended the relief of the Katmai refugees.

AT THE beginning of 1917 the "Manning" returned to Atlantic waters. She served through the World War on patrol duty and as escort to merchant vessels through the danger zone; and, after the Armistice, was assigned to the Norfolk district of the Coast Guard. She is old, as vessels go. The Navy counts on ten years' life for a naval ship; the "Manning' already has served three times that span. "And she'll still be going strong when you and I are gone," said a marine architect in Washington. "She's built solid, of honest-to-goodness oak. When we reconditioned her a few years ago, we found that some of the steel framing under the boilers had rusted and needed replacement; but her wooden sheathing, of oak planks seven inches thick, was as solid and sound as when laid thirty years ago."

The "Manning" is a favorite ship. "I've never met an officer on the 'Manning' who didn't feel a sense of security, and feel a strong personal attachment for the cutter," said a veteran of her Alaskan cruises. All through the Coast Guard I have run upon men who served on her, and every one was proud of the connection. and glad to recall some experiences of his "Manning" days.

"UNSEEN EYES" protect you when you travel—protect you from thieves, card crooks, hold-up men, and other predatory humans. These "Unseen Eyes" are the railroad detectives, the "dicks" famous in fiction and in fact. They have some thrilling adventures, and some that are weird. They try to keep you from falling a victim to your own gullibility. . . . "But," as they say, "if you will trust strangers at cards, what can we do?" You will read in next month's issue the story of these vigilant officers.

Help his little hands express his thoughts...

— and you speed the child's education

Little hands . . . striving so hard to form the difficult words that will record child thoughts . . . little, inexperienced hands so thoroughly unskilled in the hard work of writing . . .

Such deep concentration as the young child must give to the mere physical act of forming letters and words by hand is a tremendous barrier to the quick transfer of mental impressions to paper . . . yet only recently have educators and the public in general come to realize the vast possibilities of the typewriter . . . particularly the Portable Typewriter . . . as a tool of primary education. It has been proved conclusively that the child provided with a Portable Typewriter learns much faster.

These are some of the reasons:

One—Because the physical difficulty of forming letters is eliminated.

Two—Because children first learn the printed alphabet and the printed word, and the typewriter enables them to express themselves with the same familiar characters.

The first step in learning anything is interest, and children are fascinated by a Portable Typewriter.

Any Portable Typewriter Dealer is anxious to give you a demonstration at any time. He will show you how simple it is for your child to operate the machine . . . also how indispensable it is for the whole family's personal writing.

May we send you our interesting booklet which goes into the details of this amazing, new educational idea? You really owe it to your child to investigate right away.

Three—Because when the youthful mind is free of the physical difficulty of writing, the child can concentrate on expression.

Four—Because everyone will agree that the first step in learning anything is interest, and children are fascinated by a typewriter.

Five—Because children are picture spellers, and the typed word is the one they picture.

Even if the Portable Typewriter reduced the educational period as little as one half year out of the normal twelve, would you think of denying it to your children? Would you hold them back even that much, depriving them of much-needed educational time that should be applied to other things? No right-thinking parents will stand by and watch other children, equipped with Portable Typewriters, develop much faster than their own.

Let handwriting proficiency wait until later . . . provide your children with a Portable Typewriter and you will speed their education. The Portable Typewriter costs so little in dollars and cents, compared with its value to their mental development!

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

"We're Up Against It—We Young Folks Who Haven't Money Enough to Get Married!"

I AM secretary in a publishing house located in New York City. I earn twenty-three dollars a week. My husband-to-be is with an insurance company, and draws thirty dollars weekly. And we want to get married. We are not the only young people facing this problem. There are thousands of us, some of whom have even less to start on than we have. I know of two girls in my own office who want to marry now; but their fiancés haven't saved the necessary several hundred dollars with which to start a home, and aren't earning enough to keep it running. Moreover, it will be years, probably, before they are drawing a salary on which to do it. So what are all of these young people, including myself, to do?

New York City is an expensive place to live in. One can't get a three-room apartment for less than sixty dollars a month. Food for two people can't be very well bought for less than eighty dollars a month. Where do the laundry, insurance, clothing, gas and electricity, car fares and lunches come in. The old days when boys and girls brought their lunches with them are gone. Nowadays it is unheard of, even if it would mean saving four or five dollars a week. These items, therefore, have to be reckoned with.

I am all for taking the step now, with nothing to back us up except our courage and optimism, and our fifty-three dollars a week joint salaries. But Tom wants to wait. Men are funny that way. They think they are taking the burdens of the world on their shoulders when they marry. They think they must give their wives everything in the way of material comforts, never realizing that a wife is willing to stand by her husband through anything, while he is striving to get ahead.

TOM and I met two years ago. At first, we saw each other occasionally. Then, as our friendship ripened, he called once a week. Now—well, the question is: When do we not see each other? And when he leaves we both voice the same thought: "Oh, I wish you didn't have to go!" We want to be together. Everything in us cries out for companionship.

After he has gone—sometimes it is ten-thirty, more often it is twelve o'clock—I stay up to mend a pair of stockings or press a dress for the next day. I know that he goes home and stays up an hour or so to read books and articles connected with his work. He wouldn't think of bringing his work with him—nor would I feel justified in doing any while he is around. Instead, we play tennis, go to the theatre, stay in the city for dinner, take walks, and talk. It's always the same thing. We talk about ourselves. We plan for the future, and it is always: "When we have enough money we'll get married."

Tom feels he is courting me now and that he must do it the way it is done in books. A week doesn't go by that he doesn't bring me something—roses, candy, sometimes it is a string of beads, or a wisp of a handkerchief. Or we go out somewhere. And when I mention economy to him, he comes back with, "You take the joy out of giving, Mary. Don't you think I want to give you some of the things other boys give to the girls they are engaged to?" So his money goes. And that when sounds like eternity.

It is small wonder, I feel, that some of us young people are running wild. Sooner or later we want to feather our own nests, and we can't do it on what we are making. Some of us plunge headlong into parties to drown our yearnings, and excuse our actions with the thought that we live but once, and that we have a right to happiness. Some of us end up disastrously.

We have talked this matter over by the hour, Tom and I. Marriage to me means a home of my own and babies; but I can see that it will be years before we can even start, unless Tom suddenly gets an increase of a good many dollars a week. There isn't much chance of that happening, I fear. In the meantime, why can't we have the companionship that is rightfully ours? We could start on a shoe string—one room and a kitchenette. Even that would not be easy. I would have to keep on at work, babies would be out of the question for several years; but both of us would be happier than we are now.

I'VE said to him, "Let's not wait. Can't we do it now?" And his answer is, "No, we haven't anything to start on, Mary." I tell him he is silly. Doesn't he know that I would be happy in a two-by-four room with just enough furniture to sit on? But his reply is, "Yes, you would be happy; but just for a while. Then the doing-without-things would begin to irk you."

But I'm sure he's wrong. There would be so many things to keep us busy. He could tinker with his radio, and read and study while I'm around. There's the goal we are working for—a home of our own. We would find happiness striving for it. The ups and downs that came along would be short-lived. We would give up lots—dinners and theatres and concerts—but there would be other things to fill their places. It seems so utterly possible to me that it makes my heart ache when I think how hard it is to inspire him with the confidence I feel. What can I do to convince him that mine is the right way?

In three or four years we would be on our feet, instead of just starting out. We would have become adjusted to each other, instead of beginning to learn, and, best of all, we would be drawn closer because we had encouraged and helped each other in the upward climb.

Am I right in thinking this? Can we make a success of it despite our limited income, or is Tom right in feeling that we should wait. I am willing to wait; but, oh—the time seems so very long! I wonder how many other young people are troubled with this thought. I wonder how many have voiced it and met with the same response I have. M. S.

The Trail Eater

A story of Love and the Reckless Hardihood of Youth

By BARRETT WILLOUGHBY

NOME lay under the stars, snow-bound, ice-chained on the shore of a frozen sea. Its lights twinkled a gay defiance to the vast white loneliness of the North; the steel tower of its wireless station etched against the night sky a perpetual challenge to the Arctic silence; and from the top of its tallest church steeple glimmered the electric cross that served as a beacon to miners coming in from the diggings to flash a hilarious pay day along Front Street. This beacon was cheerfully maintained by the contributions of town saloon-keepers.

If there was anything incongruous in the source of the beacon fund, Nome felt no inconsistency. Nome, hybrid City of the Golden Sands, fathered by the victims of hard luck, yet grown to be the richest, most luxurious—and the ugliest—gold town in Alaska.

On a barren, harborless coast it raised its wooden shacks and false-fronted buildings of knotty pine lumber, shipped three thousand miles and priced like the finest teak. It laid the planks of its rickety, crooked streets on sands literally flecked with gold. When eight months of winter cut it off from the rest of the world, its hothouses flourished in the shadow of the Circle, even though the citizens who paid fabulous prices for local flowers and vegetables were obliged, by the annually congealed water supply, to take their baths by appointment at the Elite Barber Shop.

Nome's pagans could work in enthusiastic harmony with its Christians to raise a thirty-thousand-dollar purse for the yearly dog race; but they had not been able to organize for the purpose of financing a sewage system.

To those who had once known its ways, however, Nome beckoned irresistibly. Gay, extravagant, cosmopolitan Nome, that recruited its soldiers of fortune from every country in the world, from every walk in life: generous, simple-hearted, loyal Nome, so naïve in politics that it elected a well-loved "square" gambler for its first mayor; larrikin, gambling, dog-racing Nome, unabashed in its ribald youth, yet somehow altogether lovable in its zest for life!

Each winter it drew its men back from the ranges. With senses clean and sharp from a summer in the open, they came eager and thrilling to the inexplicable allure of the ugly Alaskan town whose spell was like that of some rollicking, slovenly, fascinating woman.

On this blue November night Kerry Wayne swung along the snowy town road, his feet keeping time to the tune he was whistling. He had driven into Nome only an hour previous, but a bath and a rub had nearly banished the stiffness that came from his day's run behind a dog team. Though a broken tow line back on the trail had delayed him, he had covered fifty miles since morning so that he might reach Nome in time to attend the supper with which the Malamute Racing Club was opening the dog-training season that night.

His stride quickened as his eyes rested on his destination down the roadway—the clubhouse, bulking low and flat under the stars, with orange light from its windows streaming out upon the snow.

Kerry hunched his shoulders, with the sheer joy of being back in town again, as he ran up the steps of the clubhouse and passed through the wide door.

THE reception-room was empty save for a white-clad Eskimo boy, who came grinning to take his wraps. When Kerry's fur coat slipped from him he stood under the clustered lights, a medium-sized, lithe-fashioned young fellow, wearing his dinner clothes with accustomed ease, yet patently of the out-of-doors. His face, lean and tanned under thick dark hair, wore rather a serious look until he smiled—a whimsically one-sided smile that slanted his mouth up a bit at the corner. He had very white teeth and a straight nose, which just now was peeling from frost-bite. His eyes, glacier-blue and deep-set under level brows, had the far-gazing look that marks the gamester of the wilderness.

There was eagerness and anticipation in his face as he crossed the reception-room, which was shut off from the main clubroom by portières of tawny moose hide. Through the hangings filtered a babble of talk, the clink of silverware against china, the subdued mingling of masculine and feminine laughter. This was the one Malamute function of the year to which women were invited, and the sounds, giving evidence that the supper was already under way, warmed Kerry's heart.

He parted the curtains slightly, and unobserved stood looking in on the gay scene. Down the middle of the room ran the table, splendid, exotic, in its gleaming silver and crystal, with a centerpiece of crimson carnations banked in a three-foot golden cup—the famous Sweepstakes Trophy in which each year the winner of the race was handed his prize money.

At the head of the table, in the rôle of host, sat white-haired Dr. Horton Kramer, newly elected president of the Malamutes. It was impossible to miss Kitty Kramer, ensconced in proud state at the foot of the table. She was radiant in a glittering gown of jade sequins, lately arrived from the States by dog-team mail. Knowing her history, Kerry regarded her with tolerant amusement—and a certain admiration. Tonight she bore not a trace of the gauche, red-headed girl the doctor had married in a dingy London suburb.

Large, deep-bosomed, with a perfect English complexion and a mass of red-gold hair, there was something piquant and alluring in the way she just missed being a beauty—and a lady. Her nose, beginning in Greek severity, ended audaciously in a tilt and a freckle or two. Her ready smile revealed strong white teeth that were a trifle prominent, yet her lips were softly red and there was the faintest hint of golden down at the corners of her mouth.

HER chin receded; but the exquisite creamy texture of her skin led the eye downward to the rounded perfection of the throat she loved to drape with nugget chains; and though her large hazel eyes were too wide open to permit of logical thinking, they were long-lashed and limpid as a trout pool in the sun. For two years those eyes had played havoc with the masculine hearts of Nome, where the joyous, pagan Kitty, safely upborne on her life preserver of matrimony, paddled about in a sea of indiscreet friendships.

Kerry's look involuntarily shifted to the man on Kitty's right, a big, dark man in his early thirties.

Rance Herrington of the Gray Wolf Mine was the richest, most influential member of the Malamute Club, as well as the owner of the year's champion dog team. It was inevitable that he should have that seat next to Kitty, yet Kerry found himself concerned for his friend. The past six months hadn't done Rance any good, he decided; they had thickened his body and coarsened the lines of his face. Then, though Kerry was far from being a puritan, his concern deepened at what he alone could see—Rance's big hand seeking and finding Kitty's under cover of the tablecloth. . . . There had been a bit of scandal about those two when he left for the hills last spring.

Kerry, suddenly feeling that his interest savored of espionage, forced his attention to other prominent guests: Good-natured "Midas" Bernard of the Arctic Bank and Trust Company, bedecked across his ample front with a nugget watch-chain; Nina, his wife, blond, bird-like, and insincere; Luce Barton, bachelor attorney, adroit in his management of litigation scandals.

Recalling a rumor that Rance had placed his affairs in Lucian Barton's hands, Kerry scowled at the pinkly-blond Barton. He disliked nearly everything about the man—his unctuous slyness, his Rabelaisian wit, his fondness for unfinished sentences murmured against a listener's ear.

In swift succession other friends and acquaintances claimed Kerry's attention, until his eyes came to rest on a girl seated at Doctor Kramer's right. She was the only one he didn't know. She was a vivid, laughing little thing with dark hair parted in the middle and done in soft whorls over her ears. There was something about her, perhaps it was her youth and the simplicity of her primrose gown, that set her apart from that flamboyant gathering. Beside her was a vacant chair, which Kerry knew must be his own.

In the wake of this pleasant discovery came a welcoming shout from Rance Herrington, who had looked up to see him in the doorway.

"Kerry! You old son-of-a-gun! I knew you'd make it! I told 'em you would!" Half out of his chair Rance was gesturing with his fork. "C'm on, Kerr! Advance to the festive board!"

SMILING, Kerry walked into the room, and the table burst into a confusion of sounds and waving napkins. There was a hubbub of salutations in bawling masculine bass and high-pitched feminine treble: "Oh, ship ahoy, stranger!" . . . "Atta-boy, Kerr!" . . . "Well, well! the old Trail Eater himself, in person!" . . . "But just a little late, as usual, Trail Eater!"

The reception was prolonged and hearty, yet under the laughter that greeted his nickname Kerry detected that note of indulgent mockery he had grown to know. As soon as he was seated, his advent was seized upon as an excuse for another toast. Glasses were refilled, and enthusiastically emptied by everyone except the girl next to him. She touched her lips to hers and quietly put it down before her plate.

Kerry turned, and met the look in her long-lashed violet eyes. It was a merry, friendly look, and simultaneously they smiled at each other. He noted that her eyes had a beguiling way of half closing and shining softly behind the fringe of her lashes.

He was about to speak to her when Rance Herrington hailed him from the other end of the table. "Bring any dogs back with you for the Sweepstakes, Kerr?"

"Twelve of the finest that ever made a track in the snow," he replied promptly. "And Duna, of course."

"The Trail Eater's hounds are always the best—before a race!"

Luce Barton's comment raised a general laugh.

Rance ignored the interruption. "We've been doing something big in the club this year, Kerry. Got twelve entries already. First prize, twenty thousand dollars; second, seven thousand; third, three thousand!" He checked them off on his fingers. "Some little wad for the lucky ones, eh?"

"I'll say! Well, I'm the thirteenth entrant—and thirteen is my lucky number!" Kerry's voice was gayly confident; but just at this moment he did not want to talk dog. There was this new girl beside him, and he was eager to know who she was. He leaned toward her.

"No one remembers that we haven't met," he said, with his air of smiling shyness. "You can't help knowing my name, it's been bellowed about enough here. But yours—?"

"Barbee Neilan." There was a pleasing, mellow quality in her voice that he liked.

"Your father—he isn't George Neilan of the Nome 'Prospector'?"

"He is that," she answered, with the faintest imitation of her father's accent.

"Good heavens! I've heard him talking about you for the past two years; but I thought you were a child away at school!"

She laughed, lifting her firm little chin, and Kerry thought the line of it enchanting. "I'm twenty, and home from the States for good. You," she continued in a livelier tone, "are none other than our landlord. Dad told me you owned the 'Prospector' building."

"That's about the extent of my worldly possessions." He smiled at her confidentially. "You know, Miss Neilan, it's always the exception that proves the rule—I'm it, at this feast of the placer kings. I'm the only poverty-stricken member of the Malamute Racing Club!"

The girl flashed him an amused glance. "But the only member, so far as I can learn, who has actually driven his own dogs on the Sweepstakes Trail," she observed approvingly.

Kerry was conscious of a sudden warming sense of happiness at her interest—an interest he felt to be untouched by that derision he had grown to expect when his racing was mentioned. Yet he deliberately turned the conversation to other subjects—skiing on the hills below Anvil Rock; skating on the river in front of the Eskimo village. He found her enthusiasm for winter sports equaled his own; and, even as they talked, he began to visualize the long, ice-mirrored stretches of Snake River with Barbee Neilan and himself swinging along together on skates.

THE supper progressed with an increasing babble of conversation and hilarity. Kitty Kramer smiled up the length of the board to where the doctor sat bending upon her a look of satisfied possession. She thoroughly enjoyed the prestige that came to her as the physician's wife; but, genuinely fond as she was of her elderly husband, a moment later she turned with equal response to meet the guarded counterpart of the doctor's look in the black eyes of Rance Herrington.

He leaned toward her, a half-amused, half-indulgent expression on his dark face.

"Satisfied, Kitty?"

Kitty's whole-hearted pleasure in material things was the magnet that drew them to her. Tonight she was reveling in her position as hostess of the Malamute Club, a social pinnacle coveted by every other woman in Nome's One Hundred. Yet at Herrington's question she allowed her pouting red mouth to modify the radiance in her eyes. "I would be, Rance, —if I had that ermine wrap."

Herrington's jaw set with sudden stubbornness; and Kitty, after an appraising look, set herself to win back his smile. But the supper had now reached the progressive stage where men and women exchanged seats at will. Herrington, who had been darting speculative glances toward Kerry and Barbee Neilan, came suddenly to his feet, and, careless that he was leaving one of Kitty's involved sentences in the air, sauntered to the head of the table.

He stood behind Kerry's chair. "Kitty wants to talk to you," he said, "so run along like a good fellow. I'll hold down your place while you're gone."

Kerry went reluctantly, and Herrington dropped into the vacated seat.

"Barbee!" The gold king's voice was taut with displeasure. "Why on earth did you come here tonight?"

Barbee's long lashes veiled her eyes while she bit into an olive. Then she looked up at his sulky face with a quick smile that was touched with mischief. "I'm here, sir," she began glibly, "in the capacity of society reporter for the 'Prospector.' 'Reliable news from all parts of the world,' sir. 'And a page for every age.' See our columns for—"

"Barbee!"

"Rance!" She mimicked his sharp tone and glance. When he continued stern and unsmiling she went on in her natural voice: "Honestly, I am here in Dad's place, Rance. The old linotype machine collapsed this evening, and the poor dear's in no end of a mess trying to get it fixed before morning. Someone had to report this great event, and, being the editor's daughter—"

"BEING the editor's daughter, you probably threw something into the darned machine to put it out of business. But, Barbee—can't you see you don't belong in this crowd? Why, you're just a kid! You're too—you're—oh, lord!" He checked himself with a gesture of exasperation. Then, scowling, he took up the girl's full wine glass and drained it. A moment later, under cover of hilarity led by Kitty's full-throated laugh, he bent his head close to Barbee's and drew her into a low-toned argument.

About them the clamor mounted steadily, and the shifting of places went on until Kerry Wayne, returning with a peremptory message from Kitty, ousted Herrington and took his own chair again.

Rance went back to his seat near his hostess. He waited, perhaps with intent, until the talk of racing dogs was at its height before he made the remark that focused upon him the attention of the entire table.

"I bought Tokon this morning."

"Bought Tokon!" exclaimed Midas Bernard incredulously. "Bought that outlaw racer?"

In the quiet that followed Herrington answered nonchalantly: "Uh-huh. He set me back just two thousand dollars, too; but, believe me, brothers, I'm going to make him earn it! I'm going to run him in the next Sweepstakes."

The announcement brought forth exclamations of dismay and vigorous condemnations of Herrington's foolhardiness. Everyone had an anecdote to tell of Tokon, the most notorious wolf-dog in the North; Tokon, the magnificent tawny husky who could become a fiend in harness, a man-tearing devil that ripped the parka off his trainer, that tried to slash the throat of any man who attempted to drive him when he didn't want to work. Tokon, who could race like the wind for a hundred miles, and then quit on the trail, and have to be carried back to the finishing post, a dead weight on the racing sled.

For two years this imperious and unconquered husky had passed from owner to owner escaping shooting only because of his extraordinary speed, strength, and intelligence—qualities which no man had as yet found a way to command.

"But I'll make the brute obey me if I have to skin him alive with a blacksnake!" boasted Herrington.

MEN shook their heads; some of the women looked doubtful, troubled. But Kitty Kramer, in a glow of approbation, clapped her hands and demanded an immediate look at Herrington's new racer. "O-oo, Rance! Telephone Slim at the kennels and have him bring Tokon over here to the party!"

Herrington, pleased by the sensation his purchase had created, sauntered over to a telephone and called up the kennels and Slim Carvey, his trainer and driver.

He made known his wishes; but it was plain there was opposition at the other end of the wire. "What's that?" He scowled into the mouthpiece. "Well, never mind whether it's good for him or not. That's my business. . . . I'll take the risk, I tell you! . . . No! Bring him over right now! . . . What? . . . Put him on a leash! . . . Danger! Oh, good lord—muzzle him then. . . . Muzzle him, I tell you, and get him here within half an hour!"

The supper went on. Women's voices grew shriller, men's louder as they called back and forth the length of the table. Barbee Neilan's young eyes took in the gayety of those about her; if sometimes they wore a questioning look as they rested on Rance Herrington and Kitty Kramer, the expression was fleeting; her face grew vividly interested again when she joined in the verbal tilting of those near her.

But suddenly a crash split the chattering din. It was followed by a thumping commotion behind the portières that screened the reception-room. Then a trickle of protesting Eskimo English was engulfed in a flood of angry American: "Get out of the way, you blubber eater! . . . But I tell you I am coming in! . . . Turn on that light and do it quick—see! . . . Never mind! I'll hold him! . . . Down, Tokon! Down, you yellow demon, or I'll—I'll—"

Chairs were overturned as the diners jumped up to surge toward that commotion. Herrington leaped ahead, yanked the hangings aside and exposed the darkened room beyond.

The crowd halted . . . gasped . . . then began backing away in awed silence.

AGAINST the dim wall of the reception-room a white-jacketed Eskimo was flattened, his apprehensive eyes fixed on the figure of a tall, rangy fellow in a fur parka. The man swayed and clung with both hands to the collar of a wolf-dog reared shoulder high as he pawed wildly to free his head from a steel muzzle.

The sudden light from the clubroom brought the tawny creature down on all fours. He swerved to face the brilliant gathering, his lean, beautiful head lowered, his fierce, proud eyes glittering behind the criss-cross steel bands.

"Isn't he a beauty?" Pride of possession was in Herrington's voice. "Bring him into the light, Slim! Let the folks get a good look at him!"

The driver's hawklike face was sulky. Kerry Wayne, perhaps, of all the men present was the only one who appreciated the protest that showed in the man's every action, the protest of the experienced dog-man against this unwarranted indignity put upon his charge; this degrading muzzling of an imperious wild thing to drag it in to furnish a Roman holiday for a thoughtless gathering.

Cursing under his breath, Slim stooped to lay hold of the leash that dangled from the outlaw racer's neck. Then with his other hand on the collar he tried, none too confidently, to urge the dog forward.

Tokon, ignoring his audience, sank to the floor and began pawing to dislodge his humiliating head-cage. The unexpected ceasing of resistance sent Slim plunging with such clownish effect that several in the crowd laughed.

The sound was a taunt to the nerve-racked dog. He leaped the length of his chain. Straining toward his tormentors, he bared his fangs in a snarl that was both terrible and piteously impotent, because of the muzzle which had shifted until the forehead strap covered one eye.

"Heavens, what a fiend!" . . . "Superb animal!" . . . "Magnificent!" Mingled exclamations of admiration and condemnation rose from the men; squeals of awed delight and murmurs of pity from the women. Barbee caught Kerry's arm. "It's not fair," she protested indignantly. "It's not a sporting thing to do!"

But Herrington, after a moment of hesitation, set his jaw and strode forward toward the bristling husky. "Confound it, Slim, let me take him! . . . Come here, you—" In a rising temper he snatched the leash from the trainer's hand. "I'll make you come to time! I'll show you who's your master! . . . Mush!" He planted his foot against the dog's braced haunches and gave a vicious shove.

With a swift jackknife turn the husky launched himself at Herrington's throat. The man dodged, but the steel muzzle scraped his cheek, caught in the shoulder of his coat and held the clawing animal against his body. With an oath he flung him aside and snatched from a stand an ornamental walrus tusk. As Tokon sprang again, he swung the heavy ivory. There was a thud, and the husky crumpled to the floor.

THE wide entrance framed the incongruous tableau—the wolf-dog lying stunned; the man, disheveled, tense-jawed, in torn evening clothes, standing over him with the ivory tusk upraised in a well-kept hand. For a space there was dead silence. Then Tokon stirred . . . attempted to rise . . . and finally came dizzily to his feet.

A murmur of relief broke the stillness. Slim stepped forward and laid hold of the dog's collar. Herrington dropped the tusk to a chair. "Take that brute out of here, Slim." There was an odd quaver in his voice. Beads of sweat stood out on his flushed face. With both hands he smoothed his disordered hair back from his brow.

After he had rubbed his bleeding cheek with his handkerchief, he gathered the tatters of his waistcoat together, and with admirably assumed carelessness stepped into the full light between the moose-hide hangings.

He smiled. "Ladies and gentlemen,"—his bow burlesqued the showman, but he failed to check the slight trembling of the hand he pressed so mockingly against his heart—"this act concludes the evening's performance. My next exhibition will take place at my kennels, where I will"—a grimness crept into his voice—"where I will teach my pet his company manners!"

The gathering, relieved of the tension, broke into loud applause. When movement and conversation again animated the supper party, Herrington turned where he stood and watched his dog, now obediently following Slim to the outside door.

Clarence Budington Kelland is the author of an amazing number of short stories, special articles, and novels. His "Scattergood Baines" stories, which have been appearing in "The American Magazine" for nine years, have had an almost unprecedented popularity. Mr. Kelland started out to be a lawyer, but was lured into literary labors by the soft enchantment of editors' checks. . . . On the opposite page appears a picture of Mrs. Emily Post. Although Mrs. Post is probably best known for her famous book, "Etiquette," which has run through many editions, she has also written a number of popular novels and an entertaining travel book. Her exceptional position in society here and abroad, coupled with the wide public acceptance of "Etiquette," has made her an international authority on manners and social customs

I HAVE been collecting the data upon which to base this article for forty years, so nobody can accuse me of undue haste. For thirty years I was collecting unconsciously—soaking it in through my pores, as it were; and for ten years I have been on the trail deliberately.

The matter under discussion is family finances.

The hero of the piece is the husband, and the villain is the wife. Which is not necessarily the fault of the wife, but of the present structure of civilization, more especially of that branch of human endeavor known as retail business.

The facts I have gathered so carefully come from a variety of sources: In my early youth I heard the gossip of the neighbors and observed without complete understanding such events as transpired under my own roof. In my later years of so-called maturity I, as a lawyer, listened to the stories of embattled husband and wife in quest of divorce, to the testimony in courts where men were being sued by merchants to collect bills which had been run, and compared notes with other legal practitioners. Since abandoning the legal profession I have scrutinized my friends and their affairs, and, being a quiet soul who never asks permission to join in a fight not of his own creating, I have been graciously allowed to sit in parlors and listen to the family battles of my intimates. Also, and without boasting, I may say that I, too, have been married.

I have watched the antics of retail merchants and of salesmen and saleswomen, and I have noted the reactions of the shopping wife thereto. I have accompanied my own wife on shopping excursions in various parts of the globe, and, without mentioning names, I may say I have accompanied other men's wives on similar errands.

In brief, then, I know my domestic finances backward, in and out, up and down and sideways, and now I come to a point where I dare venture my first positive statement, namely:

THERE are two kinds of wives: a very small quota of women who are so economical that they are parsimonious, and a very large portion who are spendthrift. There is no mean. There is no happy average. Whichever school they belong to they go the whole hog.

We used to have a saying, when I was a boy, that dogs and line fences caused more trouble than any other two created devices for setting people at odds with one another. I will add to that that more quarrels between husband and wife have been started by the mention of money than by chorus girls, blond waitresses, dancing men with sleek hair, traveling men, or complexes.

Show me a couple who have no difficulties over domestic finances, and I will show you a couple who can get away with anything. A woman can overlook any conduct on the part of her husband if he never intimates that the new hat cost too much, and a husband will condone any offense if his wife does not resort to the retort that he seems to think, simply because he gives her a little money, that that is all God and nature require of him.

KELLAND Doesn't Know What he is talking About

Answers EMILY POST

OUR friend Mr. Kelland shuts his masculine eyes to the truth and blindly sweeps all women into two fixed classes—the predatory and the parsimonious—and labels both as equally worthless! Why? Apparently because of an obsessing and narrowing experience with the deadlier of the two extremes.

And then, having voiced his grievances—bewailed would be the better word—he guilelessly declares that he knows domestic finances both inside-out and backward.

Backward! A-ha! He never said a truer word. About a hundred years backward—and then some. In fact, his whole arraignment reads like a dusty found-in-the-attic diary reiterating the plaint of an antiquated male. Where, I ask, unless from an old diary, did Mr. Kelland get his so quaintly archaic point of view? Or is he laughing in his sleeve? Can he really know so little about the modern woman, the average woman of today?

In a frame of mind that seems genuinely bordering on panic he asks What, Oh, What is poor helpless husband to do about the bills in the little dress shops that are wrecking his credit—and his life!

It seems such an emergency call, this last, that it may be best to hurry and tell poor husband quickly—before we go into all the other details that are jamming the keys of my typewriter in their eagerness to get said—that the whole "What'll I do?" query would have been nothing to answer if Mr. Kelland had endowed any of his husbands with an atom of "spunk" and a grain of common sense.

In order to make it easy, let's call the Kelland type of (Continued on page 110)

A story of the eternal Cinderella and the Prince—of youth which owns everything

The Silent Minstrel

By LYNN MONTROSS

BECAUSE they had named her Cecilia, her parents fancied that the matter of her life and character had been fairly well settled. She would, of course, be quiet and pale and mystical, like that saint whose picture hung above the old upright piano in the Kirby living-room. But Cecilia seldom did what was expected of her. At the age of eighteen, she became as willful and unreasonable as an April day: She made a cabaret singer her hero; she played her finger exercises miserably; she made any minute wide enough for tears and for laughing and for dancing. And then, suddenly, came the boys.

"I like boys," explained Cecilia.

Her mother sighed. They were such shiny boys—they gulped self-consciously, stood on one foot and said, "Um . . . Is Cecilia here?" There were two or three of them every evening, and always Edward. Mrs. Kirby could not help feeling a little sorry for Edward; he was not sleek and slangy like the others; he could not make Cecilia giggle at his every remark; he merely looked resolute and worshipful until at ten o'clock Mrs. Kirby said firmly, "Now, Cecilia, schoolgirls must have their sleep!" And Edward rose and backed toward the door, twisting his cap with big, painful hands.

When the footsteps receded from the porch and the house was quiet, Cecilia always tilted a moment on tiptoe like a wild-flower swaying to every vagrant breeze, her dark eyes glowing as she exclaimed, "Mother! I hate to go to sleep. It's like . . . dying. I want to be alive every minute."

"I wish," her mother would say, "you'd think more about your studies, and less about boys and dancing. At your age—"

"I'm eighteen!"

"At your age a girl is too young to be thinking about—"

"Boys, you're going to say." Cecilia was indignant. She tried to assume a worldly, sophisticated air but succeeded only in looking like a kitten. "You forget, Mother, that I'm not interested in boys any more. They're so young. I like older men . . . men who have known the Continent."

"Oh, pshaw!" laughed Mrs. Kirby. She guessed that Cecilia had seen some movie, and she knew how silly the dreams of a young girl can be. Sometimes she worried about this madcap who was so strangely her daughter; but this adolescent pose was too absurd.

"All right," said Cecilia in a hurt whisper as she went upstairs to her room. "All right."

AND the next evening when Edward came, Cecilia looked mysterious and withdrawn. He regarded her with boyish anxiety; sometimes she teased him shamefully, sometimes she worried him to desperation with her immature coquetry.

"Edward," she said suddenly.

"What?" Their conversations were filled with these solemn monosyllables.

She crossed the room and whispered to him loudly and fiercely, "I think I'm going away." (It was the first time the idea had ever entered her mind.)

Edward swallowed quickly. "Going away? Where?"

"I can't stand it any longer!" Cecilia stood motionless a

"I suppose," Cecilia said helplessly, "that you're Vance Crowley" moment, indulging herself in the bliss of self-pity. Then she smiled and asked irrelevantly, "Do you know Vance Crowley?"

"No. Who's he?"

"Edward! Don't you even know who he is? Why, everybody knows that much!"

"I don't," said Edward stubbornly.

Tossing her little close-cropped head, Cecilia put a worn record on the phonograph. The sentimental tremolo of a violin flowed from the revolving needle, and then began a sweet husky tenor, willfully romantic. It was as if another person had entered the primly shabby living-room, a languid, worldly man in evening clothes who walked carelessly back and forth with hands behind his back as he chanted:

"You're driving me wild,
That's putting it mild,
Sweet child . . ."

"An old one!" Edward sniffed defensively.

"Of course it is. But it's Vance Crowley singing it."

She spoke the name intimately, as if from long acquaintance—for the dreams of eighteen are beyond all understanding. So many evenings she had played this record, so many evenings that husky, romantic tenor had spoken only to her:

"Say when You're going to say when,
Then say it again,
Sweet child,
I'm wild about you!"

The voice trailed off wistfully, the violin was silent, and once more the two youngsters were alone in the room. Cecilia ran to turn off the machine. The boy stood up, his hands clenched and his face red. "You don't know him," he said miserably.

"Don't I? Oh, don't I?" The little wretch smiled back provocatively over her shoulder, and quoted glibly from a newspaper clipping she kept in her dresser drawer: "He's just back from Europe—from the Continent—and he's singing at the Club Rio, that new place on Broadway; and he's signed a contract for a thousand dollars a week to make phonograph records; and he's not young like most people you meet—he's about forty and he's been everywhere and seen everybody—and I'm—"

"You're what?"

"Oh, nothing," she whispered, as if it were very much something.

EDWARD'S young face was suddenly fearful. He looked helplessly at her, trying to cling to some proper masculine dignity. "Cecilia, you—you'd better be careful! You don't know—"

"I guess," said Cecilia with a schoolgirl's clumsy repartee, "that I'll do just what I please."

And that night in her room she wrote a letter on the crinkly mauve stationery which Aunt Maude had given her as a birthday present. The round script and the stilted, immature sentiments of admiration were those which movie actors, cabaret singers, and stage stars are accustomed to receiving in every mail as "fan letters." But it seemed to Cecilia that she had done something tremendously unique and thrilling. All the next day going to and from high school she carried the letter in her purse. Several times she haltingly decided not to post it; and then, that evening, while two boys waited in the living-room, she ran breathlessly to the drug store sub-station and returned with shining eyes.

Before long it began to be whispered that Cecilia Kirby was a wild girl. Older people too easily leap to that conclusion when they have forgotten the strange and painful fancies of immaturity. The little district in Brooklyn was as close-knit and conservative as any New England town; it was, in fact, a village, surrounded and isolated by a forest of roofs; and when neighbors met in the group of small stores and shops known as "the corner," Cecilia's name began to be mentioned.

"Why, I hear she's writing love-letters to some cabaret singer over in the city!"

(Broadway was as remote to many of the good Flatbush folk as if it were in another state instead of being only a subway ride away.)

"And I can't believe her mother knows a thing about it. Mrs. Kirby would never permit . . ."

"I wouldn't think Edward Hayes's mother would want him seeing such a giddy girl every evening."

ONLY vague remarks like these, and yet they began to carry conviction. People meant no harm or malice, but they could not comprehend the illusions which are the stuff of reality in a young girl's imagination; people misjudged the powder and rouge which Cecilia applied with a lavish, untutored hand when she was a block away from home, the absurdly extreme styles the girl affected when her mother's vigilance was relaxed for a moment; and, more than all, that unsteady laugh of Cecilia's, which rang suddenly like a handful of coins tossed from some starry balcony of youth. For there is something frightening to the middle-aged upon seeing all wild, free things . . . so many potentialities for sadness, for pain and for ecstasy.

Cecilia was too unworldly to be immediately aware of the comment she was causing: she went on showing the precious letter to her friends at high school. To these silly young girls it seemed very intimate; they would never have guessed that it was the conventional reply written by some busy star's secretary:

> My Dear Miss Kirby: Thank you for your good opinion of my singing. I am glad that you still like some of my old records, such as "Sweet Child," and I hope that the ones I am recording now will entertain you for as long a time to come. It is always helpful to receive a note of appreciation such as yours, and I trust that sometime, as you say, you will come to hear me at the Club Rio. With best wishes,
> Sincerely,
> Vance Crowley

The stationery was "distinguished looking," in Cecilia's opinion, the envelope square and heavy, the typing as personal as script; and at the bottom that bold signature, like a secret and romantic message scrawled across the white page of a young girl's experience. Each time she read the brief paragraph, Cecilia found new meanings in it. "I hope that sometime you will come to hear me at the Club Rio." . . . What could that mean but that maybe Vance Crowley wanted to meet her?

So she told the girls at high school in a burst of confidence that she thought Vance Crowley wanted to meet her . . . "Only," said Cecilia, "he didn't say so right out." And several of the girls told their mothers and sisters; then it was whispered around "the corner" that Cecilia really had a clandestine engagement with a Broadway singer. That was why her name was mentioned several times at the next meeting of the parents' club, and why two or three of the girls were forbidden to go out evenings with her.

But she was trustful and unsuspecting until the night of the Junior Class party in the high-school auditorium, a gala social event in the calendar of the very young. There was dancing, and rented palms, and evening dresses, and punch . . . and in the midst of all this glamour Cecilia learned that first lesson, so painful to youth, about wagging tongues. Curiously enough, it was Edward who conveyed it to her—sturdy, resolute Edward who went about these days squaring his shoulders belligerently as if to guard her from every stray suspicion. But his eyes were too anxious, his face too open and ingenuous to conceal his worry.

"Edward!" she cried as they were dancing together, "why are you so mean and solemn all the time? Why do you keep looking at me that way?"

He avoided her eyes. "What way?"

"That way."

For days the boy had wanted to warn her against her chatter; but he knew no tactful approach. "Well," he stumbled, "I do think you ought to be more careful about what you say and about showing that letter around—"

He would have stopped, but she pursued him relentlessly. She quit dancing and led the way to a seat. "Why?" she demanded.

Edward could conceal nothing from her, not even the overwhelming adoration which he fondly supposed to be a secret. In muffled, jerky sentences punctuated by her sharp queries at every halt, he told the whole story.

She understood all that he said. She guessed at much more. "So they think such things about me," she said in a small, horrified voice. "What awful, awful people!"

SLOWLY the room, the lights, the music, the gowns began to blur into incoherence before her eyes. She felt frightened and alone. In her heart was a blinding pain; she wanted to run like a child to some dark closet and hide among old friendly garments.

Edward followed her to the outside door, but she shook off his awkwardly comforting hand. "Leave me alone," she whispered, and walked slowly out into the darkness of the athletic field.

For a long time she stood motionless beneath the shadowy outline of a basketball goal post, while the night laid cool fingers against her hot face and wet lashes. Life seemed monstrous and incredibly cowardly.

She knew that she could never go on day after day with people tossing scandal like sharp thorns in her path. The injustice of it! Just as her elders had exaggerated a few adolescent poses, so Cecilia now magnified their censure into alarming proportions—the wildest fancies became realities. In a panic of fear she sought escape . . . somewhere . . . somehow.

And then, like a kindly beacon light within her heart, there suddenly came that husky romantic tenor, that minstrel who chanted endlessly

> "Sweet child,
> You're driving me wild . . ."

Her hands trembling with sudden resolution, she grasped her purse and started rapidly toward the nearest subway station.

AT TEN o'clock Cecilia Kirby sat alone at a table in the Club Rio. On every side of her, like quivering orchids in some fanciful garden, were gowns of mauve and rose and jade . . . old faces, young faces, the gleam of silver, the white of damask, rouge and powder and the sheen of marcelled hair. The perfume and the voices blurred into one vague symphony; the jazz was a fountain of many colors which rose and fell with gurgling rhythm; and on the parquet floor were a myriad of golden slippers like fireflies weaving in and out to the dance.

Cecilia's eyes glowed with surprise and delight as she looked about, and her breath came very fast. The frock of shell-pink taffeta with silver lace which her mother had made for the high-school party seemed simple and ingenuous—but not in the least abashed—in the company of cloth-of-gold and Parisian confections. And here, among the hard, blithe faces of these cabaret habitués, Cecilia looked even younger than her years: dark eyes, wide and eager, hair which lay in adorable ringlets close to her ears, lips parted as if she were about to exclaim softly in her wonder at this strange and glamorous scene.

People stared at her a moment, then gave up the puzzle, for the patrons of the Club Rio were too blasé to be interested even in naïveté, and they refused to be puzzled very long by anything.

"Your order, miss?" murmured a waiter.

"Yes," breathed Cecilia. Then a great doubt crossed her face like a shadow, for she remembered that she had only a few dollars, and she supposed that things would be dreadfully expensive. "I think," said Cecilia, smiling trustfully, "that I'll just have a club sandwich."

The waiter bowed and was gone; then, as suddenly as if conjured up by some hidden magician, another person appeared—this time an ample woman of forty in an extreme evening gown of black and silver, who searched Cecilia's face with hard, shrewd, kindly eyes. Cecilia did not know that this woman was a hostess, whose business it was to relieve the nightly boredom and to preserve a genial social discipline. Cecilia did not know that it was a bit unusual for a girl of her age to appear alone in a place like the Club Rio.

"You are waiting for your friends?" inquired the hostess with pleasantry which had grown habitual and authoritative.

"Oh no," said Cecilia. "I came here to meet Mr. Crowley."

"Does Mr. Crowley know you are waiting for him?"

"You see, I have a letter from him saying he wanted to meet me," Cecilia explained. She produced the letter from her purse with such innocent confidence that the hostess could no longer doubt her. "Do you think," asked Cecilia with brilliant inspiration, "that I'd better send a note to him?"

Without waiting for a reply, she found a fountain pen tangled in the untidy array of handkerchiefs, powder puff, comb, and compacts which filled her purse; and she hastily scrawled across the back of the treasured letter:

DEAR MR. CROWLEY: I am here tonight and at table 61, and I would very much like to meet you as you said in your note to me.

She hesitated a moment, but could think of nothing to add, so she smiled and handed the unique communication to the ample woman in the black and silver gown, who backed away with a dazed look on her sophisticated features.

"If you'll just see that Mr. Crowley gets it, please," said Cecilia, "won't you?"

NOW several things happened with that bland dexterity which distinguished happenings at the Club Rio. First came the club sandwich, and there never was such a club sandwich in all the world; it looked like the prize-winning float in some culinary parade. It overawed Cecilia. She was certain she would never have enough money to pay for such a fantasy. . . . But before she had time to become accustomed to the sandwich, the great room was suddenly flooded with an uncanny glow of lavender incandescence, and gauzy chorus girls flitted about among the tables like playful moths. The program had begun. And soon—maybe in only a few minutes—Vance Crowley would appear!

At this thought, Cecilia's heart first became meek for a moment, then wildly galloped away, leaving a frightened small girl who clutched the edge of her chair with taut fingers. For she had never quite realized that there was actually a Vance Crowley. He had always been merely a vision, a vaguely splendid minstrel with weary eyes who always said and did the things Cecilia wanted him to say and do. . . . But the man who was reading her note, the man who would soon be sitting opposite—what would he say and do?

She sat as still as a mouse, trying unsteadily to think what she would say when Vance Crowley finally appeared—until she became so engrossed that she did not notice the man who stood behind the other chair regarding her with curious, intent gaze. When at last she raised her eyes, she started guiltily, and immediately lost every one of the easy, poised remarks she had stored up against just such an emergency.

She could only stare at him, almost in appeal:

"I suppose," she said helplessly, "that you're Vance Crowley."

"I'm afraid that I am." He tried to appear humble, but his eyes were laughing as he sat down opposite her. "Do you want me to be somebody else?" he inquired.

"Yes." The truant word slipped out.

Cecilia whispered to him loudly and fiercely, "I think I'm going away, . . . I can't stand it any longer!"

"All right," said the stranger solemnly. "Whom would you prefer? Babe Ruth? Savonarola? The Prince of Wales? Joan of Arc? President Coolidge?"

She dared to glance up again, and her naïve gaze betrayed a flash of disappointment as well as surprise. Of course Vance Crowley was not the splendid vision her imagination had conjured up from a phonograph record—nobody could have looked like that. "He looks so much like, like himself," Cecilia thought dejectedly.

Certainly he did not resemble anybody she had ever seen, even within her vivid imagination, this tall, dark, sad man; and he was not conventionally handsome. It is true that he was about thirty-eight or forty years old, as she had hoped; but he had a somber face, somewhat battered by life, with a mouth which twisted wryly to one side when he smiled. Cecilia had a sudden wild suspicion that he was laughing at her. She was afraid of him.

In defense she became sulky in a small-girl fashion. Because she did not know what to say, she closed her lips tightly, and looked at the stage where the chorus girls had been transformed from moths into milkmaids of old Versailles. At last, after a queer little silence, she snapped out petulantly:

"I don't like this cabaret!"

It was the worst, the most willful blasphemy she could think of, and she would not have been surprised if the man opposite her had raised shocked eyebrows. Instead, he bestowed upon her for the first time a warm glance of approval. He nodded with enthusiasm. "Terrible place," he agreed.

He sighed and lit a cigarette. Cecilia hoped that he would offer her one—it would be so flattering!—but he carefully put the case back in his pocket. He sat in silence, puffing his cigarette while she fidgeted uneasily—she was used to a continuous chatter with boys, for in high-school social circles any slightest lapse in conversation was held to be deplorable.

"It must be nice to sing," she suggested hopefully.

He leaned forward, and a droll light danced in his narrowed gray eyes. "I hate singing," he said.

"You do!"

"I do. I'd much rather eat lobster salad." He leaned back impressively, with folded arms. His dark face was very grave. "Even without dressing," he added as a dramatic climax.

FOR some time a puzzled suspicion had been growing in Cecilia's mind that he was making fun of her. Now she was certain of it. A few minutes ago she had been sulky, but her inexperience contained no further weapons to combat his worldly, mocking sureness of what to say and do. In a baffled voice she said, "I think maybe I'd better be going home. . . . Is it late?"

She sat very straight in her chair, a small childish figure of uncertainty. Her dark eyes were wide and bewildered; her fingers plucked unsteadily at the fringe on her gown. (Continued on page 95)

WILSON—the Greatest

By BRIGADIER GENERAL

ON November 11th, 1918, the World War ended. Ten years ago today we were still celebrating the victory, and were planning eagerly for the return of our soldiers from France. So this seems a particularly fitting time to give you this extraordinary story of the part played in the World War by Woodrow Wilson, who, by virtue of his position, was commander-in-chief of the American military and naval forces.

General Reilly's article is of additional interest because of his own distinguished war record, and because he was for a time one of President Wilson's severest critics.

THE EDITOR

NO MAN was ever more roundly abused as a pacifist than was President Woodrow Wilson prior to our declaration of war in April, 1917—and I was one of those who abused him. Day after day, through the columns of the Chicago "Tribune," I attacked the policies of his Administration in reference to preparedness. My opinion of him was the opinion of the majority of military men of that day. (I was free to express mine, because I had resigned my commission in the Regular Army to write for the Chicago "Tribune.")

That was twelve years ago. Most professional soldiers and students of military history then thought President Wilson incapable of leading a nation in time of peril. Today, a great many of us—possibly most of us who formerly thought him a pacifist, temperamentally unequipped for leadership—regard him as a war leader of vast and rare ability. Certainly that is my opinion, reached after having participated actively in the war as commander, first of the 149th Field Artillery, and then of the 83d Infantry Brigade, both of the 42d (Rainbow) Division, and after having spent ten years in studying the history of the Great War.

None of our war Presidents and no European statesman of the Great War showed a clearer grasp of the principles necessary to bring victory, nor more determination in following them, than did President Wilson once we entered the fight.

The outward contrast in his attitude before and after war was declared is so great that it is almost as if a pacifist had turned overnight into a militarist.

Everyone remembers the attacks made on Wilson as a pacifist. Many still believe him to have been one. However, the more the cloud of misrepresentation of our part in the war vanishes, and the facts emerge like rocky peaks through a settling haze, the more clearly his greatness as a war leader stands out. All this despite foreign propaganda and acrimonious politics at home. For the facts show plainly that President Wilson reached many great decisions and, having reached them,

War Leader of them All

HENRY J. REILLY, O. R. C.

Drawings by JOSEPH SIMONT saw them through to triumph. He avoided errors made by our other war Presidents, and by the civil leaders of the warring nations of Europe.

THESE four were, perhaps, his greatest decisions as a war leader:

1. To select capable men for commanding military positions, and then to rely upon them in military matters, and back them up.

2. To propose and urge through Congress the Selective Service law.

3. To back up General Pershing in taking the time necessary to put a minimum of 1,000,000 American troops in France to make our first blow a hard one, instead of striking immediately a series of weak blows.

4. To have the American soldiers in France fight under an American commander, as a unified force.

Implicit in these decisions is the great groundwork of military success, for these are tenets designed to win a war, and not a political victory. President Wilson had to have knowledge and courage to see as he saw, and to do as he did. Later in this article, I shall explain to you, as former Secretary of War Baker did to me, how President Wilson reached some of his decisions, and what was his attitude toward the war—and toward the soldiers who were fighting it. But first let me tell what our three Generals think about Wilson. I have known them since long before the war.

Generals Pershing, Bliss, and March held the highest and most responsible positions in our Army during the war. They are the only officers since Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan to attain the full rank of General.

Their testimony proclaims Mr. Wilson free from a fault which is common to most statesmen—a fault which has caused more defeats in war than has bad generalship in battle.

This fault is the failure to understand that the methods which make for a successful political career in peace are exactly the opposite of the methods which bring victory in war.

Compromise for political reasons is second nature to statesmen. Decisive action for purely military reasons, regardless of political expediency, must be second nature to a general if he is to win battles.

The first produces what Mr. Wickham Steed, celebrated correspondent of the London "Times," calls the "peace mind," and the second he calls the "war mind."

The three Generals had no illusions on the subject. They knew from the history of our wars, and from what they had seen in Europe since the outbreak of the war in 1914, that more dangerous than a powerful and efficient enemy in front is a "peace" mind holding the reins of power in the rear.

WITH what secret misgivings as to their future must they have accepted their positions of grave responsibility, which even a Napoleon could not have successfully held if his backing depended upon a "peace" mind!

General John J. Pershing, noted for the brevity of his speech and the intentness with which he means it, says: "He backed me up."

No American General has ever had a more difficult job than that of Pershing's as Commander of our Expeditionary Force in Europe. When he tells his story of the tremendous difficulties he heroically overcame, and of the unjust criticism, both in this country and in Europe, which he determinedly faced, his place in history as a great man and a great soldier will be assured, and the four words I have just quoted will become a tribute to the memory of President Wilson.

General Peyton C. March, who was Chief of Staff in Washington, says: "President Wilson threw all the power of his great office and great personality into the war program. He backed his military advisers to the limit, and did not interfere with their performance of their military duties." It was General March's job to organize, equip, train, and embark at our seaports the troops sent to Pershing. In doing so, he exercised a ruthless efficiency. This was fortunate for the nation, but made enemies of many individuals in Congress and out of it.

History remembers the big things and forgets the little ones. However, at the time such events happen, the damage done a party leader by such enmities is frequently serious. One way out is to relieve the General responsible for the criticism. But President Wilson was above political expediency; his aim was to win the war as quickly as possible. Not once did he remove a General to save himself from criticism.

General Tasker H. Bliss says: "Both during the war and afterward, Mr. Wilson never made decisions involving military matters until he had gotten an opinion from military sources. In my considerable experience with him, I have never known him to act contrary to such opinion, once it was given him."

General Bliss sat as our representative with the premiers of France, Great Britain, and Italy and their advisers in the Supreme War Council at Versailles.

THIS council had come into existence after the tremendous defeat suffered by Italy in the fall of 1917, and which had frightened the Allies into putting aside their mutual jealousies for the moment in an attempt to get unity of military action. It was constantly the scene of disputes based on interallied rivalries. It was frequently the battleground of soldiers and statesmen of one or another of the nations, in their disagreements as to the military policies to be followed. Sometimes, in the council, plans were sprung which aimed at putting one or another nation in a good trading position at the peace conference after the war, rather than at the best way of beating the enemy. It was a place in which even a wary diplomat of wide experience could easily have "put his foot in it," thus furnishing a convenient excuse for his dismissal.

The cynical will say: "Well, they were Wilson's Generals, why shouldn't he have supported them?"

The answer is: They were not his Generals in the sense of belonging to his political party, or of having been known to him personally, or associated with him over a long period of time.

All three were Republicans. They were hardly known to the President personally. They had not been associated with him. There was not the slightest hint of the relationship which existed between President Theodore Roosevelt and General Leonard Wood.

Then, how were they chosen?

Recently, I went to Cleveland to see Mr. Newton D. Baker, who was our Secretary of War during our participation in the Great War.

One of the first questions I asked him was: "Mr. Secretary, who selected General Pershing to command the American Expeditionary Force, and how was it done?"

He said: "I selected General Pershing. I did so because of his long record of military efficiency and accomplishment. You remember the loyalty he displayed when he had the difficult task of staying far enough south in Mexico to prevent further raids on our border, while at the same time preventing any incident which could cause war with Mexico—which the President did not want. You must also recall the admirable way he stood the gaff of the criticism directed at him. All these things contributed to my choice of General Pershing to head our army. When I had made up my mind, I went to Mr. Wilson and told him my choice. He said, 'What are your reasons?' While I told him he listened carefully, and then said: 'If that is your judgment, it is mine.'"

Similarly, on the advice of Mr. Baker, and with the approval of General Pershing, the President recalled Major General March from France to become Chief of Staff, to succeed General Bliss, who had reached the age limit set by law for his retirement. However, in recognition of General Bliss's valuable knowledge of military and international affairs, stored up during more than a quarter of a century of careful study, Mr. Wilson ordered him to continue in active service.

But to return to the Chief of Staff in Washington, who is the executive officer of the Secretary of War. It was he who would determine whether or not General Pershing would get, with the maximum of speed, what he asked for from this country. Mr. Baker wanted for the job an officer who had served long enough in France to understand what General Pershing's problems really were. The President agreed with Mr. Baker.

Major General March was the logical answer.

When a young officer, March first attracted attention as the commander of the battery of artillery raised at Yale University for the Spanish-American War. Later, as a major of Volunteer Infantry, he set out with his battalions, with a week's supplies, to rescue Commander Gillmore and his party, who had been captured by the Filipino insurgents. He was gone for months, during which he whipped superior insurgent forces and penetrated far into the mountainous, savage country of northern Luzon, inhabited by headhunters, and until then untrod by any American.

His report on the artillery in the Russo-Japanese War, which he saw as an official American observer, and his close study of the new French 75 gun, and the change in artillery tactics which it brought about, was largely responsible for the rearming and reorganization of our artillery, and for its adoption of new tactics, a number of years prior to the outbreak of the World War.

RECALLING our own past history and some of the events in Europe during the World War, where "political expediency" was more dangerous to a general's military "head" than defeat at the hands of the enemy, I said to Mr. Baker: "It is nothing unusual for generals with good records to be picked at the beginning of a war; but it is rather uncommon for those same generals to survive the wave of bitter criticism which a people, particularly when unprepared for war, always indulge in because victories are not immediately produced.

"In the World War we not only had such criticism from our own people voiced by our press and Congress, but also from the Allies. General Pershing's insistence on uniting our troops into an American Army, instead of using them as replacements for the British and French Armies, and his training of our troops for warfare in the open instead of merely for trench warfare, created great opposition to him in Europe. Didn't this result in pressure being brought to bear on you and President Wilson?"

Mr. Baker replied: "Yes; Mr. Jusserand, the French Ambassador, and Lord Reading, the British Ambassador, were constantly after the President. However, the President considered his job to be that of the supreme coördinator of all the different forces of our Government, striking a united blow against the Germans. On the picture, as a whole, his mind functioned independently and clearly. On the purely military side, he simply accepted the judgment of the experts."

PRIOR to the outbreak of the World War, in 1914, a vast gulf existed between our professional military people and the average civilian on the subject of war.

The thinking professional soldiers were in the same position that a small number of modern doctors would have been in had they appeared during some plague of the Middle Ages, and advocated stopping the germ-spreading religious processions got up to persuade the Almighty to withdraw the plague.

The soldiers knew that all the world, with the exception of the United States and Britain on land, and China on land and sea, was prepared to fight on a tremendous scale immediately war should come. They knew that Europe bristled with questions that had almost caused war on several recent occasions and, undoubtedly, would cause a general European war. They knew that in disputing with Japan, we were arguing with a nation as prepared as any continental European one.

They saw most of our people blindly following the procession, like the religious fanatics of the Middle Ages, ignoring the facts of international relationship as they were, and praying at the shrine of the Hague Tribunal and Carnegie's Peace Palace.

They followed with interest the struggles of Lord Roberts and other military and civil leaders in Britain, not only to combat British pacifists but, above all, to convince the thinking Britisher that the day of helter-skelter waging of war by "up, boys, and at them" measures had passed; that war with Germany meant war on a modern scientific efficiency management basis.

From the time war came, in 1914, on, these American military men were more and more worried because apparently our people did not see that a war army of today—no matter what the enthusiasm, patriotism, and courage of the individual citizen—cannot be extemporized immediately war is declared, any more than the U. S. Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, or any other vast organization, could be created overnight.

The Allied propaganda which exaggerated Allied victories and German defeats, and mentioned Allied defeats only when too great to be hidden, and then minimized them, added to our troubles.

THE whole tendency of this propaganda was reflected by our press and, in general, conversation was to the effect that the free-born citizens of the unprepared and war-abhorring Allies have sprung to arms overnight and are giving the conscripts of the Kaiser and his war-worshiping General Staff the good licking they deserve.

Any disagreement with this shallow view was promptly labeled pro-German, even though uttered in the cause of preparedness.

President Wilson and his Administration reflected outwardly this popular ignorance of, or indifference to, the need to prepare on land. On sea, the Navy bill of 1916, providing the largest fleet in the world, was excellent. On land, the Act of 1916, while making some improvements in our Army and marking the beginning of the present National Defense Act, was not a measure to provide the war army we afterward brought into existence.

Yet immediately war was declared, the Administration, headed by President Wilson, promptly urged and brought into existence the measures necessary to mobilize the whole man power and material resources of this Nation, so that its maximum strength could be flung in the minimum time into the war arena, to crush Germany.

Nowhere in history is there a more prompt recognition and more immediate execution of the basic military fact that victory comes from the maximum use of all available force in the minimum amount of time.

I asked Mr. Baker what was the reason for this apparently complete reversal of President Wilson's point of view with respect to military matters, once war was declared; a reversal so astonishing that the military world, not only in this country but in Europe as well, is still discussing it.

He replied: "President Wilson's mind was of the kind that concentrated determinedly on whatever he was doing. As long as he thought the United States was not going to be drawn into the war, he was resolutely opposed to anything which he thought would provoke the issue.

"Once he had made up his mind we were going in, he was just as resolutely determined to go in without stint and to the limit, with the intention of finishing the job in the most thorough manner possible."

In ancient times, two enemy armies sometimes stood by and watched a champion from each fight a duel, the outcome of which was accepted as settling the quarrel between them.

In the period prior to the French Revolution, European nations settled their difficulties by means of professional armies. The people as a whole stayed home, and accepted the result of the combat between their professional army champions as settling the war.

The French Revolution put an end to that. When the European kings started their armies toward France to take from the French their newly-found freedom and give them back a monarchy they didn't want, the nation literally sprang to arms to stop this program. They did so.

THIS, and the rise of democratic government, which makes every man have a "stake" in his country, instead of being merely the subject of some monarch, introduced in modern times the practice of training the mass of the citizens of the state, in peace, so that immediately war is declared, the man power of a nation is ready as trained soldiers.

Such a system of course means that the first blows are enormously powerful, struck by millions of men in huge armies, instead of weak blows struck by a hundred thousand, later reinforced by another hundred thousand which then strike a somewhat stronger blow of two hundred thousand, and so on; the idea being that small reinforcements will steadily increase the weight of the blow struck, until after one or more years the army finally reaches a million or more, and can strike a really strong blow.

Like Britain in 1914, when we declared war we were unprepared on land to strike a strong blow immediately. The danger was that we would use such force as we had to strike a weak blow, then send a comparatively small reinforcement and strike another stronger—but still relatively weak—blow and so on.

THIS method of fighting greatly delays the day when a really hard blow can be struck. First, because the small number of trained men and officers are all hurried off to the front, much to their contentment it is true, but to the detriment of the nation as a whole, because it leaves no one behind to train the immense numbers of the new army hastily called into existence.

Second, such a method takes the time needed again and again to reorganize the force in the field, because of the casualties in each combat.

Therefore, I asked Mr. Baker: "How did it happen that we planned from the beginning not only to put a large army in the field but also to have its first blow a strong one? Did the British and French missions, which came over here shortly after our declaration of war, point out the necessity and value of such a course?"

"No," said Mr. Baker. "The British and French missions came to get money and supplies. Neither had any idea enough American troops could or would be sent to Europe to affect the military situation seriously. Marshal Joffre and General Bridges wanted a few troops to show the American flag, because of the resultant good (Continued on page 122)

"Three BIG Things I Learned from My Father"

An interview with John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

By M. K. WISEHART

UP THE Hudson at Pocantico Hills (on a beautiful estate), near Tarrytown, New York, lives a retired country gentleman who has passed his eighty-ninth birthday (and who may easily reach a hundred). As all the world knows, this man has triumphed twice—once in his undertakings and again in his health. The art of never exciting himself is said to have brought to him both these successes. Exacting observance of established habits, weighing of judgments, slow aiming in life as in his golf, have likewise been described as the means by which he achieved his victories.

Never a lover of luxury, but precise in his requirements as to convenience and orderliness, he is a character of unique simplicity. I think you would be interested to know something about his present-day routine.

Seven o'clock is his rising hour. Before breakfast, he looks over his house and garden, glances at his newspaper, and participates with his household in devotional reading. At eight-forty-five he is ready for a little game at which he is a devotee. Played with fifty-two cards, with numbered squares, it is called "numerica" and somewhat resembles Canfield solitaire. At this time of day it does not detain him long. By nine, he is in his office attending to his letters and telegrams and matters connected with various benevolent enterprises for which he is famous. Mid-forenoon finds him on the golf links in company with some of his friends, the principal of the high school perhaps, or the Presbyterian minister, or the priest of the local parish. Having returned from the links by noon, he rests, bathes, changes his clothes; and the balance of his day is mapped out as follows:

1:15. Luncheon.

2:15. Two or three games of "numerica."

3:30. He drives in his motor car, his chauffeur being instructed to seek new routes of travel and to maintain a speed of about twenty-five miles an hour.

5:30. He returns home for the longest rest of the whole day, about an hour, after which he changes for dinner and goes through the evening newspapers.

7:30. Dinner. (At his table are his neighbors and friends, sometimes his son, his daughters, or his grandchildren.)

8:30. This is the high spot of the whole day—a little more of that game, "numerica," which he plays amid the lively conversation, the laughter and jests. In the course of the evening there may be music, for there is a pipe organ in the house, and friends who sing are often invited.

Home of John D. Rockefeller, Sr., Pocantico Hills, N. Y.

Tomorrow, as yesterday and the day before, this plain country gentleman will be pleased to adhere to some such schedule as this. Who is he? Doubtless you have already guessed. It is John D. Rockefeller.

DOWN at 26 Broadway in lower Manhattan, sitting at the center of a long table in an oak-paneled room, is a man of fifty-five, solidly built, five feet seven or eight inches in height, with square shoulders, clean-cut features, wide forehead, firm lips, and a determined chin. Like his father, John D. Rockefeller, Junior, rises at seven o'clock, leaving home so as to be at his office between half past eight and nine. In the course of the morning, if business permits, he goes to his club for setting-up exercise—squash or tennis. The routine of business usually occupies him until late in the afternoon, and the chances are that when he goes home he takes a bulky portfolio of work that has to do with the many business enterprises and the benevolences in which the Rockefellers are interested.

Now, between these two men, who so strikingly resemble each other in their methodical way of doing things, there has existed for a half-century one of the most remarkable paternal and filial relationships that history records. Furthermore, it is safe to say that no man, without qualification or definite stipulation, has ever reposed in his son such complete trust in matters of vast import and involving such huge sums as the elder Rockefeller has done.

Some years ago, when the list of stockholders in the various Standard Oil companies was made public, many financiers were surprised to learn that most of the Rockefeller holdings were owned not by the father but by his only son. In the light of what I am going to tell you in this article, you will see that in this fact itself there was nothing extraordinary. The senior Rockefeller had come to the conclusion that, since his son was carrying most of the burden, he ought to have control of their interests. In consequence, he had turned over to his son several hundred million dollars in securities all at one time.

Recently, when searching the files of a New York newspaper for certain information in no way connected with the subject of this article, I chanced upon a brief item about the junior Rockefeller which interested me immensely. "I did not pick this job," he was quoted as saying; and from the context it was perfectly plain that he referred to the fact that not by choice is he one of the richest men in the world. As I read these words, I wondered what kind of man John D., Jr., really is, and other questions occurred to me: What was his boyhood like? How was he trained for the unique position which he occupies today? What are the most important things he has learned from his father about business and about life? And the other day, when the opportunity presented itself, these were the very questions I put to Mr. Rockefeller himself. As you will see, he not only answered them but, incidentally, in so doing, threw a most interesting light on the kind of man his father was and is.

TO BEGIN with, we must go back to the year 1882 when, on the eastern outskirts of Cleveland, there was a big farm consisting of several hundred acres known as "Forest Hill." This was the first Rockefeller estate. The senior Rockefeller was then forty-three years old, and was engaged in building the Standard Oil Company. He was already a multi-millionaire, having merged the oil interests of the country into a $75,000,000 corporation.

On a hilltop of this estate was a large, rambling, comfortable house, and below it was a lake which had been created by damming a small stream. Here, the Rockefeller children learned to swim, and the father was a patient and encouraging teacher, resourceful in devising mechanical means to help them to learn.

"Father was never a fancy swimmer," observed Mr. Rockefeller, "but he had a simple breast-stroke and good staying power. In my mind's eye I have a clear picture of him swimming around the lake, nearly a mile, on a hot day with his straw hat on to keep his head cool.

"Father was always an enthusiastic skater. I recall going with him to test the thickness of the ice, to see whether it was safe for our sport. The lake was deep, so Father deliberately chose a means of saving ourselves in case the ice gave way. We took under our arms long narrow boards, which would hold us up in case we broke through. I didn't realize it at the time, of course, but later I came to know that this was characteristic of him. He always took the utmost care to examine any project thoroughly; and, once he was convinced that it was safe and right, he put it through without further question.

"I have heard Father say that he regretted that he did not have more time for his family during those early years; and had to leave so much of our training to our mother. Nevertheless, he was always the companion and friend of my sisters and myself, and we learned much from him; but this was not so much by precept as by example.

"WELL do I recall that one winter evening, when I was staying at Forest Hill and Father was there on a visit, his enthusiasm for skating led him to get up shortly after midnight on a Monday morning to go with some of the workmen to our little lake to flood the surface of the ice so as to make it smoother for skating that day. He went at this unusual hour because he would not have the work done on Sunday.

"When I was about ten years old and we had moved to New York, Father had cement floors with curved edges laid in the yard on either side of our home, 4 West Fifty-fourth Street, so that the space could be flooded for a rink. Here for years we skated during the season, and many neighbors and friends enjoyed the sport with us. I can see Father to this day as he looked, with his silk hat on, doing the 'outer edge' for a few minutes in the morning before leaving for his office."

"I cannot remember when hard work was new or strange to me," the elder Rockefeller has said; and it was in this same school that his son was brought up.

"So far as money was concerned," continued Mr. Rockefeller, "we children came to realize that there was nothing we could not have, had Father been disposed to give it to us. There were other children who had a great deal more than we had. Particularly we felt that we were in a terrible plight as compared with some of our cousins.

"We were taught that we should work to earn the pleasures we enjoyed. We learned to work, to save and to give; but there was nothing rigid about the system by which we were taught this. Mother always saw to it that we had something for the collection when we went to church and to Sunday-school, and this was either from what we had earned or from the small allowance given us. If one of us saved ten dollars, then Father was ready to put ten dollars more with it to go into the bank."

In the Rockefeller household, as in many homes of lesser means, the rewards for faithful attention to duties were in nickels and dimes. For violin practice, young John D. received five cents an hour. When old enough to work about the Cleveland estate, he drew the same wages as the laborers. A winter on Fifth Avenue—a summer spent in cracking stones for a wall, splitting, sawing, and cording tough oak—at fifteen cents an hour!

YOUNG John D. did not go away to a preparatory school as so many children of the rich do today. He attended one in New York City, and he walked to and from school. It would never have occurred to him that he should be taken in the family carriage.

"When I failed to prepare Monday's lessons on Saturday," said Mr. Rockefeller, "I used to get up early Monday morning to study; for no school work was permitted in Father's house on Sunday. I had a little glass clock which showed the hands clearly when there was a light behind it. This I would hang before a gas jet, awakening every once in a while to peek at the clock for fear I had overslept. This was a bad thing, to be sure, for it kept me from getting the proper amount of sleep for a growing boy. But school work did not come easily to me, and I was determined to do the best I could. Father never expected more than that, but he did expect that. Whatever my marks, even if I was far from the head of the class, I was never censured if I had done my best."

Until he had finished prep school, young Rockefeller had been planning to go to Yale University. Before he matriculated, however, he decided that a smaller community would be more to his liking. This question as to whether college training in a smaller institution has greater advantages over that in a large institution was discussed between the elder and the junior Rockefeller as it is today between most fathers and sons; but the elder did not make the decision. He took the attitude that it was something for his son to decide for himself. So young John D. went to Brown University.

While in college he took no business courses and did not specialize. Upon being graduated in 1897, when he was twenty-three, there were three courses open to him: law school as a preparation for business, a trip around the world with some of his college friends, beginning work in his father's office at once. Here again the decision was left to him alone. He came to the conclusion that, as his father was then nearing sixty, he could not afford the time either for law or for travel. Immediately after his summer vacation, he went into his father's office.

"WHAT was the early training in your father's office like?" I asked.

"Father said not a word to me about what I was to do in the office before I went to work there, nor has he ever since. Moreover, he did not say anything on that subject to anyone else in the office, so far as I have ever learned. Apparently, it was his intention that I should make my own way.

"To begin with, I studied the books of accounts, acquainting myself with the affairs of the office generally. In lieu of law school I read a book on common law. I sat in various conferences and business meetings, listening and learning as much as I could from my father's business associates. Also I spent a good deal of time sitting in on interviews with Mr. F. T. Gates, one of my father's associates, who was unfailingly considerate and helpful in familiarizing me with the various affairs under his direction."

As the younger Rockefeller came more in touch with affairs, he signed various agreements and important papers for his father; but he did not sign as his father's attorney, never having had any power of attorney nor any specific authorization of any kind in these matters.

"Someone had to sign these papers," Mr. Rockefeller remarked. "I knew that the matters referred to were in accord with Father's wishes, and simply assumed the authority to act. My position, of course, was a very delicate one, for Father could at any time have challenged my authority for doing what I had done. I felt, however, that he trusted me and knew that I had only one desire—to help him to the full extent of my ability, and so I took the chance of acting without orders.

"Such a method of initiating a son into business as that adopted by my father is, I think, unique. I have never heard of any other father allowing his son such a free hand and permitting him to assume responsibilities in connection with such important interests without giving him detailed instructions and specific and limited authority. But it was evidently Father's idea that I should learn what I could, and make a place for myself if I were able to do so."

"Under these circumstances," I remarked, "it seems hardly possible that you could have avoided making some mistakes."

"One mistake I made taught me much that I needed to know," was the response. "While this was a powerful object lesson to me, I learned even more, I think, from the gentleness with which my father dealt with it when I brought it to his attention.

"After I had been in the office for a time, it seemed desirable that I should seek to get some knowledge of value and investments by selling securities on my own account. One of my sisters and I became partners in an investment account, the capital for which Father lent us. We paid him interest on the loan and divided the profits.

"Somehow, a speculator, with reputable acquaintances though he himself was of poor character, got in touch with some of the men in our office and told them of an opportunity to make money in the purchase of certain stocks in which, he said, a prominent Wall Street operator was interested. As I recall, a joint account was arranged between that operator and our office, whereby we were to buy the stock, half of it being the operator's account. Little by little we accumulated this stock on the speculator's representations that certain changes contemplated in the business at an early date would greatly enhance its value.

"Our commitments for the joint account became larger and larger. Later, we learned that while, at the instance of the speculator, ostensibly representing the operator, we were buying this stock for the joint account, the speculator was at the same time selling his own stock on the rising market which we were creating. At last, when we called upon him to take up the big operator's half of the stock which we had bought, he put off the matter from day to day with excuses and evasions.

"DURING all this time I had never seen the speculator. Becoming suspicious, I found upon inquiry that he used to meet employees outside, but never in his office nor ours. I made an appointment to see him in my office at a certain hour. The hour came, but he was not there. When he finally arrived, in the evening, one look was enough to satisfy me that we had been duped. He made excuses and promises, but the outcome was that we were involved in a loss amounting to an immense sum of money."

"What did you do?" I asked.

"I had not the money to meet the loan, and there was nothing to do but turn to Father. He listened to the story patiently. He did not utter one word of complaint or rebuke. He asked a good many questions, very pointed and searching ones, and probed into every detail of the transaction. When he had heard the whole story and finished his questioning, he said simply that he would see me through. That was all. There was no reproach, and not even a warning as to the future. Later I came to realize that Father could not have adopted a wiser way of teaching me the uncertainties, the dangers, and the unwisdom of speculation. He wanted me to learn in the hard school of experience; and he was big enough to utter no word of reproof and generous enough to shoulder the burden of my costly mistake.

"Elsewhere I have said that my father is the most interesting man I have ever known. In business and in life he has been my example. From him I have learned many things. For me, one of the outstanding lessons of his life is his open-mindedness. I do not mean that he is easy to convince. On the contrary, once he has reached a conclusion, he is most tenacious of his judgment. At the same time, he has always been ready to consider and reconsider any question when facts or arguments new to him can be brought to bear. His mind is never closed.

"I RECALL that back in 1914, when I was arranging to make a personal investigation of conditions in the mines, collieries, and mills in Colorado, he was not sure that I was working along the right lines in the broader industrial policies that I wished to inaugurate. But he did not oppose my undertaking the investigation in my own way. Not one word was said against it. He realized that the situation was one concerning which he was not fully informed. Since then he has come to feel that the course I followed was a wise one.

"Many times my father's breadth of mind has appeared in his dealings with members of his own family. I think of an instance that I once described at a gathering of the Dutch Treat Club, in New York.

"When the J. P. Morgan collection of Chinese porcelains, which had been loaned to the Metropolitan Museum of Art for some years, was finally to be disposed of after Mr. Morgan's death, the opportunity was offered me first to choose such pieces as I might care to buy. With the aid of an expert in judging Chinese porcelains, I selected a number of pieces, and then asked Father if he would lend me the money with which to make the purchase.

"The amount involved in this transaction was sufficiently large to alarm him. Not being familiar with Chinese porcelains, not knowing the scarcity of the pieces of highest quality and their costliness, he declined to make the loan, feeling, doubtless, that the purchase I desired to make was an unjustified extravagance.

"I then wrote to him calling his attention to the fact that I had never indulged myself in any such expensive luxury as a yacht, nor wasted money in gambling or riotous living; that these porcelains were not only beautiful but educative and cultivating, being among the greatest works of art civilization had ever produced. Again I asked him to make the loan; and this time he replied that he would do so. But later, when it came to arranging the terms of the loan, he surprised me by saying quietly that he had decided not to lend me the money for the purchase but would give me the porcelains, and he did."

I did not ask Mr. Rockefeller the amount involved in the purchase of the porcelains, nor did he tell me; but from newspaper accounts published at the time it is known that the sum was in excess of a million dollars.

"Another thing that I have learned from my father," observed Mr. Rockefeller, "is the wisdom of patience—self-control. Among my earliest recollections of him is his fondness for horses. He was regarded as one of (Continued on page 141)

The Higher you Climb the More Lonely you Become

"What I want is companionship," says P. B. NOYES, "and so I stay close to the hearts and hands of people around me"

By KEENE SUMNER

JUST back in New York, after spending one day in Kenwood. And what a day it has been! Kenwood is the home of Pierrepont Burt Noyes, president of the Oneida Community, Limited; the O. C. L., as they all call it. And to spend a day anywhere around P. B. Noyes is to have an experience not easily forgotten.

Better than a tonic, that man is. The Community too! It must be so; for here am I, after a long and strenuous day, sitting down at midnight, eager to tell what I have seen and heard and felt.

There are only about four hundred people in Kenwood. But how they do work and play, talk and write! How they do live! Just to be with them from nine A. M. until five P. M. has been like taking some newfangled electrical treatment.

There's a whole bunch of brothers and cousins and assorted relatives named Noyes. And there's "Dunc" Robertson, and Grosvenor Allen, and "Doc" Dunn, and a score of others I wasn't lucky enough to meet.

They live in charming houses; everybody practically within stone's throw of everybody else. And their smiling, tree-shaded lawns lie within a loop of Oneida Creek as if within the curve of an enfolding arm.

These folks are running the biggest business, in their own specific line, in the world. Yet nobody is disgustingly rich, nobody is poor, and everybody is doing a lot of interesting things absolutely apart from the business.

I got off the train after a rather bad night. The skies were leaden and the air was murky. I could easily have felt as glum inside as the day was gloomy outside.

View of the Quadrangle, surrounded by the buildings of the Mansion

Yet from the moment "Doc" Dunn's secretary, Miss Kellogg, met me at the station, until the last cordial handclasp of good-by, those extraordinary people made me feel as if we all had the world by the tail. Which is a grand and glorious feeling.

Coming home on the train I kept saying to myself: "They certainly do know how to live!"

Every time my thoughts got to that point they went one jump beyond. And with that jump they invariably fetched up at the one person who is the center of the whole situation.

PICTURE to yourself a man six feet tall and to spare. Slender as a boy; and, in spite of his gray hair, as young as a boy! Brown eyes that burn and sparkle and laugh. A man who talks with swift, compelling interest about everything from jigsaw puzzles to international diplomacy.

A man who could have been a millionaire many times over; but who is not one, because he doesn't "choose" to be one.

A man who not only says he would like to see other folks happy, but who has tackled the job of seeing that at least some of them are happy.

I could go on; but that gives you an outline sketch for a picture of P. B. Noyes in his own home town.

It always has been a different sort of town from those where you and I grew up. And you can't understand Mr. Noyes, or the other people who live in Kenwood, without knowing something about this place where most of them were born and bred.

You have heard of Oneida Community. For a long time it has been merely a business name. But eighty years ago it began as a religious settlement, founded by Mr. Noyes's father.

That was an era of religious fanaticism, a feverish searching of the Scriptures to discover a sure formula for being "saved."

J. H. Noyes was a powerful, magnetic personality. Having arrived at a salvation formula which seemed to him the correct one, he and his converts put it into practice.

Oneida Community was founded in 1848 and survived in its original form for more than thirty years. Its story is an amazing one; but it cannot be told here.

The only tangible things remaining today are a great, rambling brick structure, and the men and women who were born in that building.

From its beginning, about seventy-five years ago, it was called the Mansion. It grew and grew, until it became a huge affair. There were scores of sleeping-rooms; half a dozen general sitting-rooms; a library; a dining hall; a—but I can't name them all.

Here lived most of the members of the Community and here their children were born. All property was held in common.

Everybody worked, and no kind of work was held to be less honorable than another.

On a knoll in the center of Kenwood the Mansion still stands. And it is the heart of the "community" today, just as it was the heart of the Community in those strange times of long ago.

As often as not, they now call it the Big House. Or they cut the phrase to merely "the Big." A good many of them still live at "the Big." Even those who have their own homes go to the Mansion for meals if there is a hitch in their domestic arrangements.

At one end of the dining-room there is a great wide alcove. Formerly it was a separate room; the Dish-washing Room. On finishing a meal, everyone gathered up his dishes and carried them there to be washed.

THEY tell of one Community member who went to a restaurant in New York, absent-mindedly piled up his dishes at the end of his meal, and had carried them half the length of the restaurant before he realized what he was doing.

This particular section of the Mansion was known also as the Spanking-Room; a name which some of the men who eat there today have good reason to remember.

There are dozens of reminders of this curious past of theirs. In those days, smoking in the Mansion itself was forbidden. But a small separate building, known as the Smokehouse, was provided. And even today, in a group so modern that a girl can smoke a cigarette without causing comment, the old Smokehouse is referred to with humorous affection.

But there are other reminders more important than these: survivals of the old spirit itself. Fanaticism has been translated into a capacity for enthusiasm. There is the old sense of the obligation to work; the old respect for work; and, to an almost incredible extent, the old feeling that no one person, or no small group of persons should grab most of the rewards of work.

That this feeling has survived, in a modern business and a modern social régime, is due primarily to P. B. Noyes. Perhaps even he couldn't have managed it, except with those very people. But perhaps, too, no one else could have managed it, even with them.

He was born in August, 1870, in the big brick Mansion. Like the other youngsters, most of his time in his early years was spent in the Children's House. That was the Community custom.

But his first ten years were the last ten years of the old Community. Times had changed. Ideas had changed with them. And in 1880 the original Community was dissolved.

It had been supported by farming and small manufactures. These occupations continued to support the people—most of whom stayed on—although the religious communism was abandoned.

Pierrepont B. Noyes was born in the Oneida Community, New York, when it was a religious settlement. Today, under his presidency, the Oneida Community is an ideal manufacturing center, doing a yearly business of $14,000,000 in silverware. During the World War, Mr. Noyes served as First Assistant Fuel Administrator. Later he was appointed Rhineland Commissioner. He is fifty-eight years old Young Noyes went to school in Kenwood; which, by the way, is now a part of the city of Oneida, although the two are separated by a long stretch of open country. Then he went to Colgate Academy.

When the boy was sixteen his father died. The lad had been working each summer, learning a carpenter's job. This was strictly in accord with the old Community idea that everyone should work.

But he would have had to work anyway, for money was scarce. Still, he managed to go to Colgate University for two years, and to spend a shorter time at Harvard. But he earned what little he spent at both places.

IN THE very early nineties he got out of college and into business. With a younger brother, he came to New York and sold silverware to the little dealers over on Third Avenue.

He bought silverware from the manufacturers, sold it to the East Side shopkeepers, and made whatever profit he could on the deals.

I should say "they" instead of "he," for his brother was in it, too. P. B. used to average a profit of fifteen dollars a day. But as a salesman his brother was somewhat out of his element.

If he went into a shop to get an order, and the proprietor turned him down, he said to himself: "Thank heaven! That's over!" And with promptness and immense relief he made his escape.

Just why they figured that he would be in his element running a restaurant, is beyond me. But at any rate they bought an eating place over on Ninth Avenue, and the brother took charge of it.

Meanwhile, P. B. was making occasional visits to Kenwood. When a young man does that sort of thing, you don't need twenty guesses to hit upon the reason. It is always feminine gender and unmarried. In P. B.'s case, the "reason" for those visits became Mrs. Noyes a year or two later.

But meanwhile, also, other things were happening at Kenwood. Some members of the old Community had died. Some had drifted away. Those who remained were divided into factions. The industries were doing only fairly well. Altogether, things were on the down-grade.

How they would have turned out nobody knows. Because Pierrepont Noyes, down in New York, came to a personal decision which settled not only his own future but also that of the Community remnant at Kenwood.

"ONE day," he told me, "I was walking along Third Avenue in New York; early in 1894 it must have been. I was thinking about what I wanted to do and to be. And all of a sudden I made up my mind on two points:

"I decided that I didn't want to be rich and I didn't want to be poor. I wanted enough money to give me comfort and the real pleasures of life. But I didn't care about merely piling up wealth.

"I decided, too, that the best place to live the kind of life I wanted was not in New York City. I would go back to Kenwood and make a place for myself there.

"At that time, Oneida Community was manufacturing several products, including a small output of plated silverware. That part of the business amounted then to only $200,000 a year, but I believed it was the line which had the best possibilities for the future.

"Well, I did come back. I found the people divided into two camps. That gave me my first training in diplomacy," he laughed. "But it wasn't long before their differences were smoothed out and we had the first essential in any organization—harmony and enthusiastic team-work.

"Not that it was always easy! For instance, my idea of concentrating on silverware was ridiculed at first. For years our chief product had been traps and chains. We led in that field; and some of our people thought I was crazy to attempt a struggle in another direction where our competitors were already strongly intrenched.

"But I felt there would be plenty of room for our (Continued on page 129)

PART III of

The Bishop

S. S. VAN DINE'S

DRUKKER

THE Bishop Murder Case was the strangest of all those in which Markham, District Attorney, had turned to Philo Vance for help. Eccentric young gentleman of fashion and leisure that Vance was, his hobby had become the solving of just such unsolvable mysteries as this, and with Van Dine (his secretary) he placed himself at once at Markham's disposal.

Professor Dillard, retired mathematician, lived in a dignified old house on Seventy-fifth Street just off Riverside Drive, with a court behind it joining the rear court of the Drukker house on Seventy-sixth Street, and otherwise shut in by apartment-house walls. Belle Dillard, the professor's niece, had made the basement into a clubroom, and the alleyway at the side of the two houses into a long archery practice range, overlooked only by the Dillard windows and the bay window in Mrs. Drukker's room. Here, Joseph Cochrane Robin (Cock Robin to his friends) had been discovered by the professor, at eleven-forty one Saturday morning, with an arrow through his heart. No one else was in the house, except Pyne, the butler. Belle was away, playing tennis. Beedle, the cook, was out marketing. Sigurd Arnesson, professor of mathematics at Columbia and adopted son of Professor Dillard, was working at the University Library. Robin had called to see Belle, as had also a young man named Sperling—and they were rivals in archery as well as for Belle's favor. Finding Belle out, they had both gone down to the basement clubroom. Adolph Drukker, cripple and mathematical protégé of Arnesson, had also called that morning, but only Belle and Beedle had been seen to enter or leave the house—this by Pardee, an amateur chess enthusiast and friend of the Dillard family, who lived on the south side of Seventy-fifth Street. In the mail box was found a typed message:

Joseph Cochrane Robin is dead.
Who killed Cock Robin?
Sperling means Sparrow.

And in the lower right-hand corner were the two words, in capitals: "THE BISHOP."

Sperling was taken in custody, and being told that the bow found near Robin's body was a woman's, promptly confessed to the murder, though there was no shred of evidence against him.

So matters stood, nine days later. The alibis of Belle, Arnesson, Pardee, and Drukker had proved impossible to check. Arnesson had volunteered his help, and had reported that there was no typewriter or paper of the kind used in the "Bishop" note in the houses either of Pardee or Drukker; Adolph Drukker had stated that his mother, "Lady Mae," as she was called, had screamed on that morning, but she denied it; the coroner had reported Robin's death due to a blow inside the clubroom; the body had then been placed on the range, and the arrow driven through the heart. These were the only new facts.

Then, John E. Sprigg, a student of Arnesson's, was found dead at seven-thirty in the morning in Riverside Drive Park, shot through the head with a .32. This news was brought by Heath, the police sergeant on the case, to Markham and Vance.

"I can't credit it," Vance murmured. "It's too ghastly. But, of course, it's so." And in a hushed voice that brought a sense of unutterable horror into that dingy old office he recited:

"There was a little man,
And he had a little gun,
And his bullets were made of lead, lead, lead;
He shot Johnny Sprig
Through the middle of his wig,
And knocked it right off of his head, head, head."

MARKHAM sat staring at Vance like a man hypnotized. Heath stood rigid, his mouth partly open, his cigar held a few inches from his lips. There was something almost comic in the Sergeant's attitude, and I had a nervous inclination to laugh; but for the moment my blood seemed frozen, and all muscular movement was impossible.

Markham was the first to speak. Jerking his head backward, he brought his hand down violently on the desk top.

"I was in deadly terror—and yet

"What new lunacy of yours is this?" He was fighting desperately against Vance's dumfounding suggestion. "I'm beginning to think the Robin case has affected your mind. Can't a man with a commonplace name of Sprigg be shot without your trying to turn it into some grotesque hocus-pocus?"

"Still, you must admit, Markham, old dear," returned Vance mildly, "this particular Johnny Sprigg was shot with 'a little gun,' through 'the middle of his wig,' so to speak."

"What if he was?" A dull flush had crept into Markham's face. "Is that any reason for your going about babbling Mother-Goose rhymes?"

"Oh, I say! I never babble, don't y' know." Vance had dropped into a chair facing the District Attorney's desk. "I may not be a thrillin' elocutionist; but really, now, I don't babble." He gave Heath an ingratiating smile. "Do I, Sergeant?"

But Heath had no opinion to express. He still held his astonished pose, though his eyes had now become mere slits in his broad, pugnacious face.

"Are you seriously suggesting—?" began Markham; but Vance interrupted him.

"Yes! I'm seriously suggesting that the person who killed Cock Robin with an arrow has vented his grim humor upon the hapless Sprigg. Coincidence is out of the question. Such repetitive parallels would knock the entire foundation out from all sanity and reason. 'Pon my soul, the world is mad enough; but such madness would dissipate all science and rational thinking. Sprigg's death is rather hideous; but it must be faced. And however much you may force yourself to protest against its incredible implications you'll eventually have to accept them."

MARKHAM had risen, and was pacing nervously up and down.

"I'll grant there are inexplicable elements in this new crime." His combativeness had gone, and his tone had moderated. "But if we assume, even tentatively, that some maniac is at large reconstructing the rhymes of his nursery days, I can't see how it will help us. It would practically close all routine lines of investigation."

"I shouldn't say that, don't y' know." Vance was smoking meditatively. "I'm inclined to think that such an assumption would supply us with a definite basis of inquiry."

"Sure!" snapped Heath with ponderous sarcasm. "All we gotta do is to go out and find one bug among six million people. A cinch!"

"Don't let the fumes of discouragement overcome you, Sergeant. Our elusive jester is a rather distinctive etymological specimen. Moreover, we have certain clues as to his exact habitat. . . ."

Markham swung round. "What do you mean by that?"

"Merely that this second crime is related to the first not only psychologically, but topically. Both murders were committed within a few blocks of each other—our destructive demon at least has a weakness for the neighborhood in which the Dillard house is situated. Furthermore, the very factors of the two murders preclude the possibility of his having come from afar to give rein to his distorted humor in unfamiliar surroundings. As I learnedly pointed out to you, Robin was translated into the Beyond by someone who knew all the conditions obtaining at the Dillard house at the exact hour the grisly drama was performed; and surely it's obvious that this second crime could not have been so tidily staged had not the impresario been acquainted with Sprigg's ambulat'ry intentions this morning. Indeed, the entire mechanism of these weird playlets proves that the operator was intimately cognizant of all the circumstances surrounding his victims."

The heavy silence that followed was broken by Heath.

"If you're right, Mr. Vance, then that lets Sperling out." The Sergeant made even this qualified admission reluctantly; but it showed that Vance's argument had not been without its effect on him. He turned desperately to the District Attorney. "What do you think we'd better do, sir?"

Markham was still battling against the acceptance of Vance's theory, and he did not answer. Presently, however, he reseated himself at his desk and drummed with his fingers upon the blotter. Then, without looking up, he asked: "Who's in charge of the Sprigg case, Sergeant?"

"Captain Pitts. The local men at the Sixty-seventh Street Station grabbed it first; but when the news was relayed to the Bureau, Pitts and a couple of our boys went up to look into it. Pitts got back just before I came over here. Says it's a washout. But Inspector Moran* told him to stay with it."

Markham pressed the buzzer beneath the edge of his desk, and Swacker, his youthful secretary, appeared at the swinging door that led to the clerical-room between the District Attorney's private office and the main waiting-room.

"Get Inspector Moran on the wire," he ordered.

WHEN the connection had been made he drew the telephone toward him and spoke for several minutes. When he had replaced the receiver, he gave Heath a weary smile.

"You're now officially handling the Sprigg case, Sergeant. Captain Pitts will be here presently, and then we'll know where we stand." He began looking through a pile of papers before him. "I've got to be convinced," he added half-heartedly, "that Sprigg and Robin are tied up in the same sack."

Pitts, a short, stocky man, with a lean, hard face and a black tooth-brush mustache, arrived ten minutes later. He was, I learned afterward, one of the most competent men in the Detective Division. His specialty was "white-collar" gangsters. He shook hands with Markham and gave Heath a companionable leer. When introduced to Vance and me he focused suspicious eyes on us and bowed grudgingly. But as he was about to turn away his expression suddenly changed.

"Mr. Philo Vance, is it?" he asked.

"Alas! So it seems, Captain," Vance sighed.

Pitts grinned and, stepping forward, held out his hand.

"Glad to meet you, sir. Heard the Sergeant speak of you often."

"Mr. Vance is helping us unofficially with the Robin case, Captain," explained Markham; "and since this man Sprigg was killed in the same neighborhood we thought we'd like to hear your preliminary report on the affair." He took out a box of Corona Perfectos, and pushed it across the table.

"You needn't put the request that way, sir." The Captain smiled, and selecting a cigar held it to his nose with a kind of voluptuous satisfaction. "The Inspector told me you had some ideas about this new case, and wanted to take it on. To tell you the truth, I'm glad to get rid of it." He sat down leisurely, and lighted his cigar. "What would you like to know, sir?"

"Let us have the whole story," said Markham.

Pitts settled himself comfortably.

"Well, I happened to be on hand when the case came through—a little after eight this morning—and I took a couple of the boys and beat it up-town. The local men were on the job, and an assistant Medical Examiner arrived the same time I did. . . ."

"Did you hear his report, Captain?" asked Vance.

"Sure. Sprigg was shot through the top of the head with a .32. No signs of a struggle—no bruises or anything. Nothing fancy. Just a straight shooting."

"Was he lying on his back when found?"

"That's right. Stretched out nice and pretty, right in the middle of the walk."

"And wasn't his skull fractured where he'd fallen on the asphalt?" The question was put negligently.

Pitts took his cigar from his mouth and gave Vance a sly look.

"I guess maybe you fellows over here do know something about this case." He nodded his head sagaciously. "Yes, the back of the guy's skull was all bashed in. He sure had a tough fall. But I guess he didn't feel it—not with that bullet in his brain. . . ."

"Speaking of the shot, Captain, didn't anything about it strike you as peculiar?"

"Well . . . yes," Pitts admitted, rolling his cigar meditatively between his thumb and forefinger. "The top of a guy's head isn't where I'd ordinarily look for a bullet hole. And his hat wasn't touched—it must have fallen off before he was potted. You might call those facts peculiar, Mr. Vance."

"Yes, Captain, they're dashed peculiar. . . . And I take it the pistol was held at close range."

"Not more'n a couple of inches away. The hair was singed round the hole." He made a broad gesture of inconsequence. "Still and all, the guy might have seen the other fellow draw the gun, and ducked forward, spilling his hat. That would account for his getting the shot at close range in the top of the head."

"Quite, quite. Except that, in that case, he wouldn't have fallen over back, but would have pitched forward on his face. . . . But go on with the story, Captain."

Pitts gave Vance a look of crafty agreement, and continued:

"The first thing I did was to go through the fellow's pockets. He had a good gold watch on him and about fifteen dollars in bills and silver. So it didn't look like a robbery—unless the guy that shot him got panicky and beat it. But that didn't seem likely, for there's never anyone round that part of the park early in the morning; and the walk there dips under a stone bluff, so that the view is cut off. The bird that did the job certainly picked a swell place for it. . . . Anyhow, I left a couple of men to guard the body till the wagon came for it, and went up to Sprigg's house in Ninety-third Street,—I'd got his name and address from a couple of letters in his pocket. I found out he was a student at Columbia, living with his parents, and that it was his habit to take a walk in the park after breakfast. He left home this morning about half past seven. . . ."

"AH! It was his habit to promenade in the park each morning," murmured Vance. "Most interestin'."

"Even so, that don't get us anywheres," returned Pitts. "Plenty of fellows take an early constitutional. And there was nothing unusual about Sprigg this morning. He wasn't worried about anything, his folks told me; and was cheerful enough when he said good-by to 'em.—After that I hopped up to the university and made inquiries; talked to a couple of the students that knew him, and also to one of the instructors. Sprigg was a quiet sort of chap. Didn't make friends and kept pretty much to himself. Serious bird—always working at his studies. Stood high in his classes, and was never seen going around with Janes. Didn't like women, in fact. Wasn't what you'd call sociable. From all reports he was the last man to get in a mess of any kind. That's why I can't see anything special in his getting shot. It must have been an accident of some kind. Might have been taken for somebody else."

"And he was found at what time?"

"About quarter of eight. A bricklayer on the new Seventy-ninth Street dock was cutting across the embankment toward the railway tracks, and saw him. He notified one of the traffic men on the Drive, who 'phoned in to the local station."

"And Sprigg left his home in Ninety-third Street at half past seven." Vance gazed at the ceiling meditatively. "Therefore he would have had just enough time to reach this point in the park before being killed. It looks as if someone who knew his habits was waiting for him. Neatness and dispatch, what? . . . It doesn't appear exactly fortuitous, does it, Markham?"

Ignoring the gibe Markham addressed Pitts:

"Was there nothing found that could possibly be used as a lead?"

"No, sir. My men combed the spot pretty thoroughly, but

"Why," she exclaimed, "there's only one here! The other is gone".

*Inspector William M. Moran, who died two years ago, was, at the time of the Bishop case, the Commanding Officer of the Detective Bureau.

nothing showed up."

"And in Sprigg's pockets—among his papers . . ?"

"Not a thing. I've got all the stuff at the Bureau—a couple of ordinary letters, a few odds and ends of the usual kind. . . ." He paused as if suddenly remembering something, and pulled out a dog-eared notebook. "There was this," he said unenthusiastically, handing a torn, triangular scrap of paper to Markham. "It was found under the fellow's body. It don't mean anything, but I stuck it in my pocket—force of habit."

THE paper was not more than four inches long, and appeared to have been torn from the corner of an ordinary sheet of unruled stationery. It contained part of a typewritten mathematical formula, with the lambda, the equals and the infinity sign marked in with pencil. I reproduce the paper below, for, despite its seeming irrelevancy, it was to play a sinister and amazing part in the investigation of Sprigg's death.

Vance glanced only casually at the exhibit, but Markham held it in his hand, frowning at it for several moments. He was about to make some comment when he caught Vance's eye; and, instead, he tossed the paper to the desk carelessly, with a slight shrug.

"Is this everything you found?"

"That's all, sir."

Markham rose.

"We're very grateful to you, Captain. I don't know what we'll be able to make out of this Sprigg case, but we'll look into it." He pointed to the box of Perfectos. "Put a couple in your pocket before you go."

"Much obliged, sir." Pitts selected the cigars, and placing them tenderly in his waistcoat pocket, shook hands with all of us.

When he had gone Vance got up with alacrity, and bent over the scrap of paper on Markham's desk.

"My word!" He took out his monocle and studied the symbols for several moments. "Most allurin'. Now where have I seen that formula recently? . . . Ah! The Riemann-Christoffel tensor—of course! Drukker uses it in his book for determining the Gaussian curvature of spherical and homaloidal space. . . . But what was Sprigg doing with it? The formula is considerably beyond the college curricula. . . ." He held the paper up to the light. "It's the same stock as that on which the Bishop notes are written. And you probably observed that the typing is also similar."

The body of Sprigg was discovered by a bricklayer, who was cutting across the embankment toward the railway tracks

$$B_{ikst} = \frac{\lambda}{3} (g_{ik}\, g_{st} - g_{is}\, g_{kt})$$

$$B_{ikst} = 0 \quad (\text{flat at } \infty)$$

The paper . . . contained part of a typewritten mathematical formula.

HEATH had stepped forward, and now scrutinized the paper. "It's the same, all right." The fact seemed to nonplus him. "That's a link anyway between the two crimes."

Vance's eyes took on a puzzled look.

"A link—yes. But the presence of the formula under Sprigg's body appears as irrational as the murder itself. . . ."

Markham moved uneasily.

"You say it is a formula that Drukker uses in his book?"

"Yes. But the fact doesn't necessarily involve him. The tensor is known to all advanced mathematicians. It is one of the technical expressions used in non-Euclidean geometry; and though it was discovered by Riemann in connection with a concrete problem in physics, it has now become of widespread importance in the mathematics of relativity. It's highly scientific in the abstract sense, and can have no direct bearing on Sprigg's murder." He sat down again. "Arnesson will be delighted with the find. He may be able to work out some astonishing conclusion from it."

"I see no reason," protested Markham, "to inform Arnesson of this new case. My idea would be to keep it under cover as much as possible."

"The Bishop won't let you, I fear," returned Vance.

Markham set his jaw.

"Great God!" he burst out. "What damnable sort of thing are we facing? I expect every minute to wake up and discover that I've been living a nightmare."

"No such luck, sir," growled Heath. He took a resolute breath like a man preparing for combat. "What's on the cards? Where do we go from here? I need action."

Markham appealed to Vance.

"You seem to have some idea about this affair. What's your suggestion? I frankly admit I'm floundering about in a black chaos."

Vance inhaled deeply on his cigarette. Then he leaned forward as if to give emphasis to his words.

"Markham, old man, there's only one conclusion to be drawn. These two murders were engineered by the same brain: both sprang from the same grotesque impulse; and since the first of them was committed by someone intimately familiar with conditions inside the Dillard house, it follows that we must now look for a person who, in addition to that knowledge, had definite information that a man named John Sprigg was in the habit of taking a walk each morning in a certain part of Riverside Park. Having found such a person, we must check up on the points of time, place, opportunity, and possible motive. There's some inter-relation between Sprigg and the Dillards. What it is I don't know. But our first move should be to find out. What better starting-point than the Dillard house itself?"

"We'll get some lunch first," said Markham wearily. "Then we'll run out there."

Arnesson

X
A REFUSAL OF AID
(Monday, April 11th; 2 p. m.)

IT WAS shortly after two o'clock when we reached the Dillard house. Pyne answered our ring; and if our visit caused him any surprise he succeeded admirably in hiding it. In the look he gave Heath, however, I detected a certain uneasiness; but when he spoke his voice had the flat, unctuous quality of the well-trained servant.

"Mr. Arnesson has not returned from the university," he informed us.

"Mind-reading, I see," said Vance, "is not your forte, Pyne. We called to see you and Professor Dillard."

The man looked ill-at-ease; but before he could answer Miss Dillard appeared in the archway of the drawing-room.

"I thought I recognized your voice, Mr. Vance." She included us all in a smile of wistful welcome. "Please come in. . . . Lady Mae dropped in for a few minutes,—we're going driving together this afternoon," she explained, as we entered the room.

Mrs. Drukker stood by the center-table, one bony hand on the back of the chair from which she had evidently just risen. There was fear in her eyes as she stared at us unblinkingly; and her lean features seemed almost contorted. She made no effort to speak, but stood rigidly as if waiting for some dread pronouncement, like a convicted prisoner at the bar about to receive sentence.

Belle Dillard's pleasant voice relieved the tensity of the situation.

"I'll run up and tell Uncle you're here."

She had no sooner quitted the room than Mrs. Drukker leaned over the table and said to Markham in a sepulchral, awe-stricken whisper: "I know why you've come! It's about that fine young man who was shot in the park this morning."

So amazing and unexpected were her words that Markham could make no immediate answer; and it was Vance who replied:

"You have heard of the tragedy, then, Mrs. Drukker? How could the news have come to you so soon?"

A look of canniness came into the woman's expression, giving her the appearance of an evil old witch.

"Everyone is talking about it in the neighborhood," she answered evasively.

"Indeed? That's most unfortunate. But why do you assume we have come here to make inquiries about it?"

"WASN'T the young man's name Johnny Sprigg?" A faint, terrible smile accompanied the question.

"So it was. John E. Sprigg. Still, that does not explain his connection with the Dillards."

"Ah, but it does!" Her head moved up and down with a sort of horrible satisfaction. "It's a game—a child's game. First, Cock Robin . . . then, Johnny Sprigg. Children must play—all healthy children must play." Her mood suddenly changed. A softness shone on her face, and her eyes grew sad.

"It's a rather diabolical game, don't you think, Mrs. Drukker?"

"And why not? Isn't life itself diabolical?"

"For some of us—yes." A curious sympathy informed Vance's words as he gazed at this strange tragic creature before us. "Tell me," he went on quickly, in an altered tone; "do you know who the Bishop is?"

"The Bishop?" She frowned perplexedly. "No, I don't know him. Is that another child's game?"

"Something of that kind, I imagine. At any rate, the Bishop is interested in Cock Robin and Johnny Sprigg. In fact, he may be the person who is making up these fantastic games. And we're looking for him, Mrs. Drukker. We hope to learn the truth from him."

The woman shook her head vaguely. "I don't know him." Then she glared vindictively at Markham. "But it's not going to do you any good to try to find out who killed Cock Robin and shot Johnny Sprigg through the middle of his wig. You'll never learn—never—never. . . ." Her voice had risen excitedly, and a fit of trembling seized her.

At this moment Belle Dillard reëntered the room, and going quickly to Mrs. Drukker put her arm about her.

"Come," she said soothingly; "we'll have a long drive in the country, Lady Mae." Reproachfully she turned to Markham, and said coldly: "Uncle wishes you to come to the library." With that she led Mrs. Drukker from the room and down the hall.

"Now that's a queer one, sir," commented Heath, who had stood looking on with bewildered amazement. "She had the dope on this Johnny-Sprig stuff all the time!"

Vance nodded.

"And our appearance here frightened her. Still, her mind is morbid and sensitive, Sergeant; and dwelling as she does constantly on her son's deformity and the early days when he was like other children, it's quite possible she merely hit accidentally upon the Mother-Goose significance of Robin's and Sprigg's death. . . . I wonder." He looked toward Markham. "There are strange undercurrents in this case—incredible and terrifying implications. It's like being lost in the Dovrë-Troll caverns of Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt,' where only monstrosities and abnormalities exist." He shrugged his shoulders, though I knew he had not wholly escaped the pall of horror cast on us by Mrs. Drukker's words. "Perhaps we can find a little solid footing with Professor Dillard."

The professor received us without enthusiasm and with but scant cordiality. His desk was littered (Continued on page 65)

Ten Games that will give Life to Your Party

They are favorites with some of America's greatest party-throwers— Try 'em at your own risk!

By EDWARD LONGSTRETH

A DISCOVERY which affects the peace of mind, and even the happiness of millions of men and women throughout this country has just come to light. I refer to the recent revelation that up-to-the-minute Americans have gone daffy playing games. Pop into any party that is sizzling with life, and the chances are that you will find the guests in the happy throes of "Averages," "Categories," "Crime," or whatever is the latest wrinkle in mirth-provoking, brain-teasing diversion.

In the course of hunting out sure-fire games, my fellow-conspirator, Leonard T. Holton, and I invaded five hundred reputable homes and shamelessly demanded the favorite game of the inmates. As a result of our efforts, we unearthed nearly two hundred indoor games, and tried 'em on the dog; that is, such friends as would stand for having their parties converted into experiment stations. About one hundred and fifty of the two hundred games recommended proved highly entertaining. These we put into our book; but in this article we're going to pass on to you what we consider the best ten.

The game "In the hat." Robert Sherwood and John Held, Jr., have made amazing scores with it

Try 'em at your own risk. We refuse to be liable for split sides, or broken ribs.

With all due modesty (a rhetorical phrase), we confess that for years the greater part of our time has been spent in circulating among those polite men and women who had wild-eyed the clock, and writhed in agony, wondering just how soon they could break away from a dull party and make tracks for home. Like countless other guests, we, too, had reached the saturation point of repeating the rounds of deadly gatherings dedicated to the memory of conviviality.

As long as no better device was at hand, it was all very well to extol the beauties of noble conversation, or to fall back on bridge as a method of killing time after dinner. Not that anybody was deceived. On the contrary, everyone knew that such methods of passing time were very uncertain as reliable entertainment. Both had (and have) serious drawbacks, especially if some of your guests happen to be not particularly good at either.

The alternative?

Games. The best games that the minds of America's brightest wits and party-throwers have been able to devise; games that are challenges to all the intelligence, originality, resourcefulness, and sense of humor you possess. Please don't crowd, ladies and gentlemen. We'll demonstrate presently.

At this point, some of the very wise guys will probably emit shouts of derisive horse-laughter at the idea of full-blooded modern Americans snooping around the living-room in quest of beans, cantering madly after a vacant chair in "Going to Jerusalem," or skipping merrily in circles playing "Drop the Handkerchief." These sneers had best be made in private—if at all. Surely no one wants to be branded as a moss-back number, as one who is uninformed and out of step with his times. We hereby give fair warning that such will be the fate of all those who think that games begin and end with the quaint old relics out of a musty past, like "Spin the Plate," and "Post Office."

In all fairness, it must be confessed that there are some just grounds for going off half-cocked in belittlement of the game idea. One is likely to think first of those lamentable parlor rompings of the 'Nineties, which brought the word "game" into disrepute as soon as necking became more popular. Some of our readers may recall the old-fashioned kissing games which once enlivened whole evenings for a generation which did not have the refuge even of auction bridge. Those were the days when parlor etiquette was so stuffy that boys and girls called each other "Miss" and "Mister" until after they were married. And the idea of a man's peeking at a girl's shoe string was enough to send both parties into hysterics. No wonder they resorted to kissing games to put a little spice into life.

But with the passing of the old-fashioned parlor, the need for sentimental games also passed. With the advent of the living-room, there came a period of dullness never equaled in all the history of civilization. Men and women, gregarious creatures that they are, still assembled by force of habit; but they came together with dread of the long evenings, with the nerve-racking menace of boredom.

AT FIRST, guests yawned discreetly; presently they yawned openly; eventually they rebelled. Out of this rebellion dawned a new day, or rather a new evening. Now our best people romp through an evening with games like "Averages," "Getting Your Number," "Plot and Counterplot," "Murder," or "Crime," and tear up the house playing "Lottery," or jazz "Charades." Guests who used to be straining at the leash by ten-thirty now want to stay to welcome the milkman.

The modern party is a combination of everything that goes to make life bearable, from small talk to refreshments, from games of nonsense to games of skill and wit. Of course, if your guests prefer to separate into aloof little groups of four, and play cards, nothing will stop them. But, praise be, it is no longer inevitable, or even essential, to play bridge these days in order to kill time until eleven o'clock. Even when the card tables are spread about, we know of several excellent short stunts that will counteract the nine-o'clock tedium at bridge when a good dinner may make players drowsy—and dull. Two of the best of them are included in the selection which we will come to presently.

BUT, before we go into that, I want to make an important point: Games are a means, not an end. The object of the party is to have people go home feeling as though they had never before in their lives spent such an entertaining evening. The means to effect this highly desirable end are many; but in our humble opinion one of the best is the use of one or two well-chosen and well-timed games.

For one thing, games stimulate folks to talk easily and naturally. Conversation, to be at its best, must flourish when the talkers are not self-consciously relying on their talk to carry through a whole evening. Imagine the feelings of a famous comedian when someone comes up to him at a party and says, "Oh, Mr. Wham, please be funny for us!" Under such circumstances, it is of course impossible for him to do anything but attempt an escape. The same panic menaces the best conversationalists alive when a host gets them all seated and says to them, by implication at least, "Now talk!"

One pathetic incident will make clear the horror of such crises and the urgent need for the relief of our discovery.

On a certain occasion I had been invited with several others to meet a minor celebrity from England. When dinner was over and we had all solemnly assembled in the living-room, we plunged desperately into conversation. The subjects of Prohibition and the Younger Generation were exhaustively discussed, and the opinion of the petty celebrity on both was asked, and hearkened to with awe. There followed a dissertation by someone on the unseasonableness of the weather—a sure sign that the evening was going to the dogs. Imagine our horror when we discovered at a little past nine o'clock that all the reliable topics of conversation had already been completely exhausted!

There followed the usual forced isolated laughs, the familiar gasping attempts to keep the conversation rolling, and, finally, the deadly, ossifying doom of silence. This was broken at last by a sudden attack of hysterics on the part of our hostess, who was quickly carried from the room.

Poor soul, she did not know any games. Just one little game, one tiny stunt, would have started the conversation again, briskly and naturally, and the evening would have been saved.

As a game preserver of some experience, we shall now proceed to offer what we consider the best all-around games culled from our expeditions into the various wild places where games are found. You may not like all of them, you may never use some of them, but out of the group you may surely find at least one that will save the life of your next party.

Let's start with "Categories." Some of the best minds in America today amuse themselves with this game in their spare time and off hours. Yet it offers no difficulties to those of us who make small pretensions to wit and learning. Of course the amount of fun to be got out of the game depends largely upon choosing categories suited to the experience of those who are playing. But we'd better be starting. Here goes!

Select a five-letter word like "smart," and put it letter by letter in a column down the left-hand margin of a piece of paper as in the accompanying diagram. Then rule the paper into lines across the page, one for each letter. Next, draw vertical lines cutting across the horizontal ones, so as to form five columns. At the head of each column, write the name of a category, or classification group, such as cities in Europe, American poets, and so on. We suggest here some that are diversified enough to challenge the readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

	Famous Generals	Food-stuffs	Cities in Europe	Office Supplies	Operas
S			Siena
M				Mucilage
A					Aïda
R		Radish
T	Turenne

You are now ready to play.

Give each player a paper and pencil and a time limit of twenty minutes. At the end of this time, the papers are signed, collected, and marked for score on this basis: 5 points for each word which is not found on any other paper; 3 for each word found on only one other paper, and one for all other words correctly filled in.

A FEW of the old games have survived the test of time because they still challenge the ingenuity and inventiveness of brilliant men and women. The best of these in our humble opinion is "Charades." This game is the most popular of all with actors and with many writers. It is a prime favorite with the comedian, W. C. Fields, as well as with Louis Bromfield, the novelist, and Carolyn Wells.

The most tantalizing charades to guess and the most amusing to play are those in which you can pun part, or all, of the word.

To take a relatively simple word as an illustration of the possibilities lurking in a game of Charades, suppose one of the guests secretly selects the word "performance." He then assembles a cast for producing the word in a series of short acts, one for each syllable, winding up with an act for the whole word. The other guests must try to guess from the dialogue and action what the word is.

The person who has chosen the word becomes the stage director. He selects his cast and takes its members into his confidence. He asks his host for any simple properties he needs, like an umbrella or a frying pan. The idea is to put the word over so that nobody can guess it.

Now "Performance" is ordinarily divided into the syllables Per-form-ance, but the director decides to pun them as Pur-form-ants. (Another and harder possibility is Pur-for-manse). When the action is agreed upon (and this must be done quickly to prevent tiring the audience with "waits") he announces: "This is the first syllable."

The actors enter. One of them takes the part of a cat and the other impersonates a spinster. The spinster coddles the cat and the cat purrs. A few irrelevant and misleading words and actions are thrown in, for smoke screen.

The next syllable is announced, and the scene implies the shop of a modiste, who shows a model to a customer. The customer likes the dress but objects to the form of the model as not good. The modiste retorts that it is not good form to say so. (This is really too easy.)

The third act shows the distress of a housekeeper upon discovering ants in her pantry.

Then the final act is given, in which it is announced that the whole word is concealed. Here the word "Performance" can be used to mean the show itself, or the accomplishment of some deed; but in any case, the actors are careful not to make their performance a dead give-away.

A MORE informal version of Charades is called "Adverbs." As might be expected, this is also very popular with theatrical people. This game is especially popular with the New York Theatre Guild company of actors—Alfred Lunt, Lynn Fontanne, Margalo Gilmore, Dudley Diggs, and the playwright, Sidney Howard. We have found that it makes an equally big hit with people who never get a chance to exercise their dramatic instincts on a stage.

One of the players secretly chooses an adverb. For the benefit of those who have been out of school for more than two years we hereby proclaim an adverb to be a word which modifies in some way the action of a verb. Such words as "quickly," "passionately," or "despondently" are all adverbs in good and regular standing.

Having selected an adverb, the player faces the crowd. One by one, they ask him to do something "in the manner of the adverb," for they are trying to guess by his actions just what the adverb is. The person who guesses it correctly is allowed the fun of being IT and choosing another adverb.

At the slightest sign that a party is tottering to its fall, there are several splendid trifles that will prop it up again. Here is one simple expedient that comes in especially handy for such moments:

"Hello! B. O.," says Rube Goldberg (left)
"Hello! O. B.," returns George Abbott (right)

Take a deck of cards off the card table, if one is in use; otherwise, produce a deck out of the table drawer. Also get an old felt hat out of the hall closet. Ask one of your guests if he has ever tried this one. Before he has time to answer, make him sit down in a chair. Then place the hat, with the brim up, only five feet in front of his feet. Hand him the deck of fifty-two cards and ask him to see how many he can deal into the hat. Those on the rim do not count, unless they fall in. Your guest will look disdainful. The hat is so close he can almost touch it. He begins nonchalantly, expresses embarrassed surprise after a few cards flutter wide of the mark, and, finally, gets down to business in deadly earnest, while the others clamor for their turn. It sounds simple: Try it.

Rube Goldberg, the comic-strip artist; George Abbott, the actor and playwright, and several of their friends, quite by chance invented an amusing stunt game while they were in Florida together last winter.

There was a business convention of some sort going on at their hotel, and they heard prosperous executives calling to each other, "Hello, R. B., how goes it?" . . . "Have you seen G. S.?" So the cartoonist and his friends fell into the whimsical habit of hailing each other with initials—any initials at all. Then it became a game. One would hail the other with a pair of initials, and the other had to reply by using two initials that would complete a four-letter word. "Hello, B. O., how goes it?" Rube would challenge, and his friend would brightly reply, "Okay, O. B." thus completing the four-letter word "Boob." Four-letter words were soon selling for the price of a seat on the Stock Exchange, as the ability to start a bona fide word which the other could not finish had certain advantages agreed on beforehand, say, an ice cream soda, or a free dinner.

Valuable as such casual, spontaneous stunt games are, they cannot be relied on to save more sustained emergencies—such as a gape, or open yawn, in the ranks as early as nine o'clock, the zero hour at most parties. After long service in testing and experimenting with the various ways of keeping a party going at full cry, we warn you that the game must be suited to the occasion and the players. The best game alive will languish when a tactless hostess drags it into the party by the hair on its head.

ANYONE who can read can follow the rules of the most successful games, but not everyone has a natural gift for leadership. The leaders at parties usually rush forward of themselves if they are encouraged even moderately. However, any hostess who is ambitious to give a real wow of a party, should invite at least one guest who will help put across anything that she may suggest.

It is important for anyone with a desire to be known as an (Continued on page 138)

The Man who Lived in Eternity NOW!

By WILLIAM
PELLEY

Illustrated by HARRY FISK

The manner in which the stranger snatched the flat, battered fold from the floor and glanced up, puzzled Sam for a moment

"THERE'S a man in the front office wants to know where he can find a good housekeeper," announced Myrtle Corey, coming into the composing-room of the Paris "Daily Telegraph" one hectic afternoon in 1914.

Samuel P. Hod, editor and publisher, paid scant attention to his office girl. The European war was under way. Editorial supervision of the make-up, especially front-page headlines, was becoming a daily rite in the "Daily Telegraph" office.

"He'd better try a Want Ad," the editor responded finally, when Myrtle had repeated her announcement. "Who is he, anyhow?"

"I think he's that new carpenter who's bought the Rogers place out beyond where I live. On the road toward Foxboro."

"Rogers sold his farm to a man named Hadley. I heard somewhere he comes from Prince Edward Island. Has he got smallpox marks all over his face?"

"Yeah," nodded Myrtle, "and half a dozen kids, and no wife, and the nicest eyes I've ever seen in my life."

"Ask him to wait till the paper's on the press. I'll help him if I can."

"He told me his wife and youngest baby were drowned in an excursion boat that capsized coming back from Nova Scotia. He's moved down to Vermont to get better wages. Probably he needs them."

And Myrtle returned to her duties "out front."

WHEN Sam came in, twenty minutes later, he witnessed a queer little incident: A soberly dressed, quiet-spoken man was sitting patiently in the office with something in his hands. As the editor crossed the threshold, the seated man dropped it. Sam saw a pair of red leather covers about the size of a post card, badly dog-eared. The manner in which the stranger snatched the flat, battered fold from the floor and glanced up, puzzled Sam for a moment. The man seemed chagrined.

"Sort of hard luck, warn't it, to lose your wife, with six kids to look after?" the publisher suggested, pulling up a chair for himself. "How old are they, anyhow?"

"Tommy, the youngest boy, is seven. Nellie's the oldest—nineteen! But she can't be much of a mother to the rest because she's . . . she's blind."

"Blind!"

"She lost her sight two years ago. A cookin' vat exploded in a canning factory where she was workin' through vacation. Doctors tried to save her eyes, but claimed at last it couldn't be done."

The stranger had secreted the little pair of leather covers in his hip pocket and now picked up his hat.

"You must have married rather young—to have so much family for a man your age."

"Eva—that was my wife—always did want children. I used to tell her we were shoulderin' an awful lot of responsibility, havin' so many youngsters, on my wages as a carpenter. But she'd laugh and say, 'Just one more can't make the responsibility much worse.' You don't find many women holdin' sentiments like that these days, Mr. Hod."

"You bet you don't," the editor agreed.

The man turned his hat around in his hands.

"Some day," said he, "I'm hopin' the Almighty'll make it clear why wives and mothers like Eva have to be taken before their time, leavin' behind so many who need 'em. There's such a lot of women in the world, if it ain't wrong to say it, that could be spared so much better. . . ."

"I understand," the editor replied. "What's the ages of the others?"

"Myra's ten and Jeanie's eleven. Then three years before them there was Dot—short for Dorothy. She's fourteen."

"And the oldest boy?"

"Seba? He's sixteen. He's goin' to high school in September, but he can help around the place. When the steamboat company settled for the accident, I thought it was only right to put the money into property, so they'd always have a home. You don't know anyone 'round this town needs a good carpenter capable of bein' foreman, do you? I need work, as well as a housekeeper. If I can't find a berth, it'll sort o' stump me. I'll have to set up for myself." Again he turned the inverted hat.

"I think it'd be best, anyhow," the editor advised. "In the long run, you'll make more."

PRIVATELY, Sam Hod made up his mind to see that the new resident got business even if it meant superfluous "repairs" in the "Telegraph" office; he was the type of man to command that sort of interest, even the first time one met him.

"I hope I can get a good woman cheap," the carpenter went on. "But I can't much more than give her a home."

"There ought to be slathers of females—widders and such—glad to live out on the Rogers place with a first-rate family of children."

"It's kind of out o' the way, that back road. And . . . there'll never be another woman precisely like Eva!"

When Hadley had departed—with the editor's promise to find a woman somewhere—the local reporter, Paul Lyman, by the window sat back from typing some items.

"What sane woman's going 'way out on that lonely back road to live, and push her neck into the noose of six ready-made kids? Women these days don't go in for raisin' other women's families. Huh! They don't even go in for raisin' families of their own."

"It'd be an act of Christian charity," declared Sam, "to find that man another wife."

"Well, you've been everything in this town from head selectman to dog-catcher, Mr. Hod. You mean you'd turn matchmaker?"

"I'd like to," muttered Sam. "Men like Hadley are this country's backbone. They don't deserve to lose good wives." Then, after a ten-minute interval, during which most of the staff had put Hadley out of their minds, he suddenly raised his head, and avowed, "Yes! By heck. I will!"

"Will what?" asked Myrtle.

"Find Hadley a wife!"

But he didn't. Instead of trying to contrive a match, Sam frantically attempted to break one up. Three weeks later Paul Lyman came in off Main Street and got instant attention by announcing:

"You remember Jake Hadley, the Blue Nose carpenter? Well, who do you s'pose he's taken on for housekeeper? Doc Pressey's ex-wife! And she's made a bet with the cook over to the American House to marry him by Christmas, or forfeit a hundred dollars!"

The office was quiet with the silence of tragedy.

Not that Amy Pressey was inherently bad, merely that she was shallow. She was one of those women who live by emotions and impulses, justifying every dereliction by the statement, "I just couldn't help it. Something bigger'n I was, inside me, drove me to do it." Back in 1914, she was somewhat of a town institution by reason of being its only divorcée. She both looked and acted the rôle, and seemed to enjoy the distinction it brought her.

"Doc" Pressey—a "horse doctor," by the way—had always been more of a joke than his wife since their arrival in Paris, five years before. He was an undersized, boggle-eyed, excitable man, who dressed the year round in mackinaw and hunting boots. They had taken the tenement over the Rathburn Pharmacy on the corner of Main and Hill streets, a trifle outside the regular business section. Whereupon he started to supply good "copy" for the "Telegraph."

IN THE aforesaid half-decade, four juicy news exploits had specifically involved him. First, being an addict to practical joking, he had contrived to coax a horse into the house, via a rear embankment. The animal's weight had crashed in the floor, however, killing the horse and wrecking the drug store. The three other episodes were his wife's desertions.

She was a small, sharp-faced, shrill-voiced woman with an eyeglass chain draped over one ear, and three upper teeth that bit her lower lip. She was known to bedeck herself with cheap jewelry upon arising in the mornings, had a dozen canvassers for silk hosiery pulling her doorbell for collections as many times a week, and her own child, a sickly youngster of seven, was never clean-faced from Monday to Friday.

Saturated with cheap romances, which she read when she might better have been doing her housework, she ran away first with Walt Howard's hired man. The veterinary chased them and found them in Brattleboro. He must have forgiven her, for he lived with her another two years, till he came home one winter's morning from an all-night case to find a note pinned to the youngster's dirty frock.

She was "sick of it all," and had eloped with a fellow five years younger who trimmed windows that year for the Williams' clothing store. And if the Doc followed them, she vowed to "end it all." But the Doc took a chance, learned at the station which way they'd bought tickets, and confronted them ultimately in Hanover, New Hampshire. Mrs. Pressey ended nothing—not even a propensity for high-voltage infidelity. Because she promptly repeated the exploit with an itinerant soda-jerker who worked that next summer in the down-stairs drug store. This time Doc Pressey attempted no pursuit.

THE town understood that his wife rather enjoyed being brought back and forgiven. Anyhow, she was piqued when the Doc went on about his practice, and eventually she came back of her own accord to see about it. She had been away long enough, however, for Pressey to get a quick and legitimate divorce. Entering her former home, she discovered one Emily Seaver installed there, the youngster—allotted to the father—for once clean, and the tenement in order. Pressey had married Emily within a week of getting his freedom.

Amy Pressey nearly wrecked the place before Chief Hogan was summoned to remove her. Whereupon, she kept the Doc in a week of apprehension by getting word to him of the various ways and places in which she was going to end her life. Two weeks later she had moved down into the none too savory American House, waiting on table for her board and flirting with the men who labored in the nearby brickyards. She bided her time to "get back" at the community. For a month Paris worried.

But not half so much as Sam Hod worried—for his carpenter friend—when Paul's information was confirmed, and a personal visit to the Hadley domicile revealed how securely Amy Pressey was ensconced there. Sam Hod came back with his kindly face dolorous.

"Sufferin' Moses!" he groaned in recital. "She's sweet as honey to Jacob, fairly reeks with female dependency and martyrdom; and yet she hates children, and 's only settin' her cap for this stranger to spite the respectable element who'll have none of her."

"Can't Mr. Hadley see through her?" asked Myrtle. "Hasn't he heard the stories about her?"

"He's got queer ideas, that Hadley. He holds the idea that because they're women, all of 'em must be as good as the one he loved and lost. I saw it by the way he stuck up for the Doc's wife while we were lookin' at his stock in the barn. That type of man can't see through a woman—any sort of woman!"

"Is he stuck on her already?"

"Well, he's been so harassed, lookin' after them live-wire youngsters, that all he can think about is the way Amy's 'sacrificed' to go out and help care for 'em. When a man's had a hard row to hoe, and all of a sudden finds a female volunteerin' to help him hoe it—and give him sympathy besides—he's not apt to hate that female, not exactly! So I say, Sufferin' Moses! . . . What on earth can I do?"

But Sam, along with the rest of the valley, had much more to hear from Amy Pressey than could carelessly be conceived. The woman may or may not have known what Paris thought about her and how it held her. She may or may not have cared what it said about her, and whether Jake Hadley heard it or believed it. The fact remained that, having a certain shallow pride to maintain before those acquaintances with whom she had made base wagers, she had to stick to her place and exhibit a semblance of finding satisfaction.

At least she had no time to read cheap novels, and she gave up silk stockings and jewelry in the mornings. She did not lie abed till ten o'clock, either. Not with five youngsters who had to go through the hectic daily turmoil of getting dispatched for school.

Tommy, aged seven, was the first to win her. He came in one noontime, his chubby arms laden with little kittens.

"Lookit!" he declaimed. "Fresh kittens! Th' ol' cat had 'em in the barn!"

The Pressey woman turned from her work at the sink. She beheld the expression on his upturned face, the dawning wonder at life in his eyes. And something stirred in her breast that not even the birth of her own child had awakened. A laugh and a sob crowded in her throat. Down on her knees she found herself, her arms opened wide. Boy, kittens, and emotions were all fused together. . . .

Then there was Nellie, the blind girl.

Being the type of woman who went through life with her heart on her sleeve, the sightless daughter's attempts to make herself of use were nearly too much for Amy Pressey to endure.

"Don't try to do nothin'. Just go and sit down, and let me do it," she found herself offering a score of times a day, till at last it grew into a habit. Yet not quite a habit. Something more like a principle.

Having an inherent instinct toward finery for herself, she began taking a competitive interest in dressing Myra, Jean, and Dot for school. Once in the village she overheard an exclamation at the neat appearance the girls always made. Amy Pressey had a new thrill in that moment—a different sort of thrill from any that had ever before come to her.

"I'll show this dratted town!" she vowed grimly.

And she did. All unaware of the change it was working in herself.

ONE night Seba grabbed her and kissed her when she had a pressed suit ready for him to wear to a party. Instead of a romantic heart-leap at a kiss from a younger man, this time Amy Pressey dropped in a chair by her ironing board, and Jake Hadley entered to discover her sobbing. The man was more distressed than the woman.

"I know the work's pretty hard," he apologized, "and I'm considerably back in your wages. But please don't feel any worse than you must—"

"But I don't feel bad!" she cried with candor. "I'm happy, happier than I've ever been in my life! I never dreamed things could make such a difference."

"Things? What things?" the astonished man demanded.

"Oh, you'd never understand, so why try to tell you?" And she was gone into her bedroom, with the door closed between them.

Then there was Jacob himself.

Work grew precarious with the advance of winter. Money was scarce. He could not meet her wages. She watched deep furrows grow down his pitted cheeks. Once, arising in the night to fasten a loosened blind, she heard him sobbing alone in his bedroom. He wept as men weep, sobs which are tearless, racking the diaphragm.

She stood a long time in nightgown and shawl, work-reddened hand on the knob of his door. Her own heart was racked to go in and comfort him, racked as it never had been in her life. But a queer strength sustained her. A quarter-hour she stood there, fighting a battle with herself. Then this woman, who had deserted husband and child, and run away with three different men, dropped her hand from the knob and went back to her place beside Nellie.

THE day before Christmas she drove alone into town, buying such gifts for the children as her purse could afford. Mainly she patronized the "five and ten," because sixty dollars of her money went to apply on her wager with the American House cook. The pity of it was, the cook took the money. Yet Amy Pressey derived a weird sense of gratification from meeting that payment. . . . The story leaked out and the community marveled.

She debated a long time over a gift for Jacob. In the end she bought nothing. She discovered that she couldn't, though her reasons therefor went unanalyzed.

The war in Europe settled to a gory stalemate. To get money to provide for the demands upon him, Jacob temporarily gave up his carpentering. He took a job in the knitting mills, where foreign orders were heavy. Twice a day he drove back and forth along the Foxboro back road. Sometimes his housekeeper drove in for him. Of a Saturday night people saw them together in the village, bargaining over supplies, like husband and wife.

"Why in thunder don't he marry her?" barometrical Paris demanded in ire. "It's a rotten sort of deal to hand Amy, after her pullin' herself together the way she has."

"Guess he's still in love with the woman who was drowned," declared a millhand in Edwards's cigar store. "He carries her picture around in a cardcase and looks at it often. I've seen him do it on his job to the shop."

"What does she look like?" another demanded.

"Cripes, he ain't showed it to me! He don't show it to no one. But I'll bet I've seen him open up that little pair o' leather covers a couple o' hundred times."

Behind his cigar case, Cal Edwards's eyes were quizzical. "Sure it's a picture of his wife in that cardcase, Joe?" he demanded.

"Sure. It must be. What else would he look at?"

"Well, it isn't!"

"It isn't? What is it? And how do you know?"

"He left it behind him in here with his wallet, one night, and I was able to return it to him. It isn't any woman's picture. None o' your business what it is. But it's what keeps Jacob Hadley on even keel, and I admire him for it. I've got pretty well acquainted with that feller, on and off. He put a piazza on my Elm Street house. I don't mind sayin' that when my sister died, it was what he told me that kept me from going to pieces. She was all I had."

"What did he tell you?"

"That's none o' your business, either!"

Amy Pressey likewise discovered early that Jacob carried the little leather folder always in his pocket with something inside that seemed to give him peace. She found it beneath his pillow one morning and a horrible stab of jealousy—one of the few which ever assailed her—impelled her to open it. She sat a long time on the edge of the bed when she had done so, and into her own tired face came a nobility which had never been there before. She made the bed and replaced the leather fold where he might find it that night if he came to look. She never told him she had seen it. (Continued on page 159)

Christmas—The Magic Season

When the Heart Rules the Head

By ARCHIBALD RUTLEDGE

THE work which I had planned to have Ephraim do was really of the most imperative sort; and he had been selected from hundreds of negroes as the man who could most speedily accomplish my design. Yet, as I warmed in my description of what we were to accomplish in the remodeling of the old stable into a garage, glancing at my listener I saw that he was thinking of other things. A strange light was in his eyes—the gleam of innocent mischief that betrays the child and the tramp in each one of us.

With what I felt was irresistible argument, I attempted to wed the good Ephraim to my plans. I explained my hope in detail and assured him that he was the only man who could finish the work in ten days, when it was essential that it should be done. But my carpenter remained unconvinced. His whole attitude was that of a child who, upon being advised of the glories of education, rebelliously, with a primal wisdom, dreams of green fields and wild flowers and little furry and feathered friends of the fragrant wood.

With a certain archness, a certain wonder at my inattention of the thing essential, Ephraim at last looked full at me.

"But, Cap'n," he objected, with as much astonishment as politeness permitted, "ain't you done remember that next week is Christmas?"

I was properly rebuked. There's one season of the year, thank God, when we abandon ourselves to those delirious and orchid-luring guides, our emotions. At Christmas the heart dethrones the head, the essentially great ruler then comes into his own. It compels us to do high things; it permits us to do foolish things. It sanctions our being childlike. It permits us, with gallant idiocy, when we have only a dollar in the world, to spend that dollar on someone else. It urges us, for one brief week, to be gloriously, recklessly, unselfish. Spiritually, it draws the whole human family close. . . . Like nothing else in the world, it starts us on long journeys homeward. Why is it that we look more eagerly forward to Christmas than to any other holiday? Is it because that is the one season in the year when the heart is an unlimited monarch? That hard word, "practical," is a tyrant most of the year; but when Christmas comes we can live spontaneously, as children live. Men let business cares go to the devil, where they should go; they break their slavish routine, shed their crusts and come forth, once each year, as children of God.

Christmas has magic in it! When November is nearing its end, men begin to cast long glances homeward, to fidget, to rebel against their usual tasks. "Christmas will soon be here" is a saying that plays havoc with the dull order of ordinary life. Christmas is the real turn in the year. We approach it cheerily; we have a fine time when it comes; we loaf, hunt, visit for a week after it is over, and then, perforce, we gird ourselves to begin a new year, looking forward to the next Christmas. That is very vividly true with children, and what is true with them would be true with us, if we were free.

I REMEMBER a Christmas I spent on a lonely sea-island. I had not chosen to be there. The sailboat on which I was homeward bound was completely becalmed some twenty miles from her destination. We lay in the lee of the dim semi-tropical isle, waiting for a breeze. Though it was Christmas Eve, the afternoon was balmy. I watched the dark shores of the mainland longingly; I watched the sky attentively, hoping for clouds and a good stiff wind. But all was serene. The waters of the huge bay behind the island were so limpid that the incredible symphony of sunset was echoed in that opalescent sea.

Then the dewy white stars blazed in the velvet blue. . . . There were only three of us on the sloop, and we were homesick. But the fact that it was Christmas Eve gave us a certain happiness. . . . Under those great sea-stars, with the surf rolling splendidly in the distance, there could be, at such a season, no feeling save one of worship.

There's an Eden for which each of us longs; but it is intangible, receding. Often we are in it and know it not until it is too late. That lonely Christmas Eve I wanted sorely to be at home; but never has the spirit of that mystical time seemed nearer than on that Holy Night when I was an exile.

When, with the coming of the flood tide at dark, we found that there was no breeze stirring, the three of us went ashore for a stroll on the beach. Though wooded and of great size the island was without human habitation. There was a radiant moon that tinged the solemn woods with silver wonder and shone afar on the sleeping waters. The glimmering surf plunged drowsily on the quiet shore.

Down the long white beach we walked on that strange Christmas Eve, conscious of the ocean's ancient amplitude of power, conscious of the luminous serenity of the night, opening fragrant and flowerlike, conscious of the divine quietude of resistless energy manifest in the vast and ordered universe. . . . The earth was all acceptance, worship; and the moon poured down a measureless penetrating tide of glamour. The sea, the stars, the moonbeams fair, the silver-filleted tall pines—all these we saw, we felt. Over the white beach breathed aromatic airs fresh from the sweet myrtle thickets of the island. The majestic rhythm of creation was apparent on every hand. "The sea is His, and He made it;" and the stars that jewel the wondrous sky, and the dewy dark woods, and our own hearts. . . . If Christmas means the consciousness that God is love, and that our love for one another is the almighty solvent to cure all human ills, I never felt the truth of it all more strongly than on that beauteous night, on that lonely island, where the only songs were silence and the rolling anthem of the beach.

We reached home next day at twilight; we were twenty-four vital hours late. But the beauty about (Continued on page 133)

"I love a white Christmas," says Mr. Rutledge. "Snow is beauty obliterating the world; its glamour is akin to moonlight. Snow is gentleness, chaste as the mountain air, virginally cool, softly smoothing the tawny dead leaves and the patient little bushes."

MISS FONTANNE and her husband, Alfred Lunt (you see them together on the opposite page), are both stars of the Theatre Guild. They have been married for six years, and have been playing in the same company for the past four years. Mr. Lunt is a native of Wisconsin and Miss Fontanne of England; each one had theatrical ambitions from childhood, and each began by "speaking pieces." Stage stars sometimes are jealous of one another, so when these two entered the same company their friends hung out the "Danger Ahead!" warning. These friends now cheerfully admit that, as prophets of domestic troubles, they are failures.

Jealous? We Should Say NOT!

MARY B. MULLETT

PROLOGUE: In a left-handed sort of way, the theme of this story is Jealousy; for it is about a man and a woman who braved the green-eyed monster, and left him flat.

As for these two chief characters, they are everything we could wish a hero and a heroine to be: young, handsome, charming, and touched with the glamour of fame.

You might call them a prince and princess of the stage; for, as almost everybody knows, Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne are twin stars in the galaxy of the Theatre Guild. And the Guild itself is a brilliant constellation in the dramatic sky.

But not everyone knows that Mr. Lunt and Miss Fontanne are also man and wife. They have been married six years. And during four years of that time they have been playing in the same company, often in the same plays, measuring their abilities side by side.

Even their friends said this couldn't be done without one or both becoming jealous of the other. "Danger ahead!" these friends muttered. But they now admit that, as prophets, they were all to the bad.

The curtain rises on the dining-room of a New York apartment. In one corner a picturesque stairway leads to the bedrooms above. Later, we discover that another stairway leads from the bedroom floor to a big studio-living-room at the top of the building.

A man is arranging some flowers. At least, he is sticking them into a bowl on the table. Sometimes he looks like a boy of fifteen. Again he seems about thirty-five. He is probably somewhere in between; but we soon decide that it doesn't matter just where.

If he should live to be seventy-five, there still will be times when he will look fifteen.

He is Alfred Lunt, the hero of our story. Our heroine, Miss Fontanne, is just now coming down the stairway, slender and very lovely. The lady; not the stairway.

When I try to describe Lynn Fontanne, I get all mixed up as to metaphors. She is rather like vivid and exotic music. But she is like something else, too; something clear and clean and mentally four-square.

If, for instance, she were a house, you would like that sort of house for a home. It would be warm and bright and gay—and it would not come crashing down about your ears if some wind of trouble blew up a storm.

"Lynn," says Mr. Lunt, regarding the floral decoration with marked disapproval, "these flowers are terrible."

"Why, darling, I think they're rather lovely," says Miss Fontanne.

Being English, she uses the word "darling" with an easy casualness which we Americans seldom acquire.

"Do you think so?" asks her husband. "They remind me of a boarding-school girl with adenoids."

IT IS a joy to talk with Alfred Lunt. Serious and highly intelligent, he nevertheless is endlessly amusing. A combination devoutly to be desired in anyone! But in a husband—well, it is nothing short of a heaven-sent miracle.

"I begin to understand," he went on, still eying the flowers resentfully, "why the insane patients at Oshkosh used to stick out their tongues at the calla lilies."

"Oshkosh!" I exclaimed. "What were you doing in Oshkosh? I thought you were English, too."

"Dear me, no! I was born in Milwaukee. My father was from New England; and my mother was Hattie Briggs, of Hortonville, Wisconsin. She looks like a duchess. At least, she looks as a duchess should, but—judging from my limited experience with duchesses—the way they seldom do look."

"ALFRED had an American father and mother," said Miss Fontanne, "a Swedish stepfather, and now he has an English wife."

"No wonder he can interpret any character, from a Hungarian to a Hottentot!" I said. "And, by the way, how did you two happen to become actors?"

"I can tell you," laughed Mr. Lunt. "We both began by speaking pieces. At the early age of three, when Lynn lived in an English village in Essex, she used to recite a piece about a little girl who was taking her dolls to the seaside and—Tell her about it, Lynn!"

"Well," said Miss Fontanne, "in the last verse there was a long word, and all through the first part, I was getting ready for it. Finally, with my face red and my whole body tense, I brought it out:

"'She dis-lo-cated her shoulder.'

"And then I finished in a breathless rush, to the accompaniment of uncontrollable laughter on the part of the audience.

"My popularity as a reciter," laughed Miss Fontanne, "was simply because I was funny and didn't know it. My mother used jokingly to say, 'Lynn will be a second Ellen Terry. Some day she'll be earning twenty pounds a week!' And I, not realizing that it was just said in jest, believed every word of it. (Continued on page 124)

The Strange Result of a Well-Aimed SNOWBALL

It ruined a bishop's high hat, it reformed a Chicago street urchin, and it gave to America one of our greatest public health doctors

By NEIL M. CLARK

ON a sunny Sabbath morning in mid-winter, a bishop was walking down Michigan Boulevard, in Chicago, bound for his church. Suddenly, an expertly-aimed snowball whirled through the air and sent his "topper" flying, a hopeless wreck. He turned to see a ragged urchin making a hasty get-away.

"Boy," the bishop cried, "come here!"

It would be hard to say what caused the boy to obey. But he did. And, strangely, he was not greeted by a scolding, but by an arm pleasantly thrown about his shoulders, and with a heart-warming smile.

"My hat furnished you a first-rate target," said the bishop; "now, will you do something for me?"

The boy's wary eyes held a query, and a doubt.

"I want you," the bishop explained, "to come to my Sunday-school. We'll show you a good time, and you will find lots of friends."

The boy knew all about that Sunday-school, from the outside. Mostly, it was attended by rich folks. He had never been inside, never had expected to be asked inside. Hence, he accepted the invitation with alacrity.

They made a queer pair, the ragged urchin and the dignified but bareheaded bishop, as they walked down the street and turned into the church. But the incident, in spite of its humorous features, proved to be the beginning of a friendship that lasted without a break until the bishop's death. For the boy, it was the turning point of a lifetime.

Until then this nine-year-old lad, whose name was Herman Bundesen, had roamed the streets, half-wild, often legging it swiftly away from the police. Not far from the bishop's church, on the very edge of one of the roughest districts in the city, he sold newspapers. His home was behind a saloon. His two pals sold papers three blocks away. The three of them played together, and were united in their common fear and dislike of a certain "Tough Kid," who sold papers at another corner near by.

But the incident of the snowball brought about a change. The bishop—Bishop Cheney, of the Reformed Episcopal Church—studied the boy Herman, perceived that he had a capacity for thoroughness, and strength of character; and encouraged him to develop his abilities, and to live with a purpose, cultivating the ideal of service.

Thirty years and more have passed. Of the three newsboys who were pals and ran wild together, two are in the penitentiary serving life terms for murder. The third, Dr. Herman Neils Bundesen, is known as one of the foremost fighters for health in this country.

We were sitting in Bundesen's beautifully furnished office. I knew that the man whose legs were flung at ease over the arm of the chair, had been called "the outstanding health officer of the decade"; I knew that, as health commissioner of Chicago for nearly six years, he had made an astonishing record in lowering the city's death rate; that when he quit this post he was deluged with offers, and jumped from a salary of ten thousand dollars to positions paying forty thousand; that as president of the American Public Health Association, he holds the highest office in the gift of his fellow workers in this country; that as a writer, some of his books have attained a distribution of three million copies, and translation into several languages; that as a practical preacher of the doctrine of health, perhaps no living man ever carried his message in person to so many, for it is estimated that he has addressed from the platform more than a million people, not to mention countless millions who have heard him by radio.

All this I knew. But what I did not know was that Doctor Bundesen rose literally from the gutter, that his earliest years were spent in an orphan asylum, that his career represents a triumph against adversity, and a struggle such as few men have the courage and determination to carry to so high an achievement.

Bundesen is forty-six years old. He might be thirty, for all the traces left on his features by time. Believing in what he fights for, he keeps himself in perfect health; Rooseveltian vigor is his dominating characteristic. (And he has a healthy Rooseveltian family of six children.) Sandy-haired, firm-lipped, firm-jawed, his blue-gray eyes look at all men straight and unafraid from behind their shell-rimmed glasses. At times, in grim flashes of speech, one glimpses the raw ore that has been turned to steel in the shaping of his career.

HERMAN NEILS BUNDESEN was born in Berlin, Germany, in 1882.

"My father," he said, "was killed a week or ten days after I was born. My mother brought my sister and me to this country when I was about six months old, thinking she could make a better living here. But the struggle among strangers was much harder than she thought it would be.

"She tried giving private lessons in foreign languages—about all she knew how to do. But pupils were few and far between, and the work didn't bring enough to keep the family together. She finally had to put my sister and me in the orphan asylum for a time.

"I was a pretty wild sort of boy when I knocked off Bishop Cheney's hat with a snowball, and got invited to his Sunday-school. I'm satisfied that if it hadn't been for that incident I'd probably be where my chums that used to sell papers with me are—behind the bars! I was headed that way.

"But Sunday-school gave me new ideas. I began heading in a different direction."

From his earliest days, Bundesen wished to become a doctor.

"If you ask me why," he said, "I can't tell you. Were there physicians in our family? No. It was just the way I happened to lean.

"Always, if there was a hurt dog in the neighborhood, it fell to me to look after him. More than once I went to the drug store for a nickel's worth of iodine to plaster on some dog that had been fighting, when maybe it was the last nickel I had and I missed my supper for it.

"I used to hang around old Doctor Mercer's house too; he was the physician that everybody went to in that neighborhood, and many a time I (Continued on page 78)

If You Ask Me:

Bad Names are Easy to Call But Hard to Recall

I LISTENED this noon to a heated political argument. It occurred in a New York club where men are supposed to be gentlemen. National elections, however, fan strange fevers. For a minute a fist fight seemed brewing; but one of the belligerents finally turned on his heel and stalked stridently from the room. As a parting shot, he barked:

"I refuse to argue any longer with a moron!"

In thinking the fracas over, it struck me that I had heard this word moron a great many times in the past six or eight years. It has got to be sort of a shibboleth among the smart fellows. They use it to brand those human beings for whose mental processes they have a vast and withering contempt. It signifies that the party of the second part has a mind that ought to be stored in the skull of a ten-year-old child.

It's a convenient word! If a person doesn't happen to think as you do, if his customs are not your customs, you can advertise your superior smartness by tying this can to him. It makes you feel quite smug and up-to-date.

Up-to-date? . . . Not by a jugful! You have become a contributing member to one of the oldest societies in the world. It has formed the background out of which have emerged most of our important historical figures.

You are blood-brother to the "superior ones" who considered Oliver Goldsmith a "stupid, heavy blockhead, little better than a fool," or the medieval Italians who thought that Michelangelo was rather a dunce. Although the word was not in use at the time, Lincoln was a "moron" and an "ape" to many of his enemies. Horace Greeley was a blockhead to the boys in the printing shop who put ink in his straw-colored hair. Arthur, Duke of Wellington, was considered a stupid youth; Lord Kitchener was "the dullest boy that ever entered a school"; Charles Dickens was so unpromising that his father predicted he would be a disgrace to the family. General Grant was "slow-witted," Hans Christian Andersen was always in disgrace and never knew his lessons, while in his early schooldays Sir Isaac Newton was usually at the bottom of his class. . . . Your prototypes, my friend, have made fun of all the simple souls out of whose ideas have been evolved the steamboat, the electric light, the automobile, the telephone, the air-brake—not to mention a score of other modern wonders.

You may not be unlucky enough to mislabel a budding genius, but it might be wise to watch your step anyway, if you find yourself in danger of getting too superior. It isn't nice to call people "morons" and frequently it isn't accurate. Moreover, it's not a bit forehanded. Some day you may want to strike one of your "morons" for a job—or a loan.

Bad names are easy to call but hard to *re*call. Before you bandy them about too freely, make sure that they fit. . . . And then don't do it!

Out Where the Highways End!

That's where "Mike" Dorizas, explorer, athlete, and college professor, has met with some of the weirdest of his wild adventures

By WILLIAM S. DUTTON

I WAS in search of a story of adventure. The very word conjured up pictures of African jungles, of Arctic wastes, of smoldering intrigues in the tropics, savage wars. Famous names slipped through my mind—Byrd, Amundsen, Lawrence, and others of men who had made the world ring with their deeds. These were of the front-line, of the aristocracy of adventurers—but their stories had been told.

Suddenly it occurred to me that there is a democracy of adventurers too, to which unsung millions of us belong. The miner, the steel worker, the riveter high above the street; the doctor summoned to combat death, the lawyer who crosses wits with lawyer; the farmer who stands helpless while the storm beats down upon his fields; the salesman who invades the strange city, even the jobless man in search of a job—are not these adventurers all?

And the question leaped at me, "Why not get away from the regular paths and see if an adventurer of parts can't be found even in the unlikeliest place?"

Whereupon I tried to think of the place in which the physical hazards of this hurly-burly world seemed fewest, and finally decided upon the schoolroom.

"The teacher," I reasoned with myself, "after all, is an intermediary. He takes the facts that others have brought to light, and in the calm of his schoolroom merely passes them on to others to be translated into action."

BUT in a schoolroom I found a man who has heard the bullets of South American revolutionists patter against the walls of his room; who has been captured by Mongolian bandits; who has slept on the desert in the tents of Arabs, and has broken bread with the Lapp in the Land of the Midnight Sun! A man who has fought with bare hands for his life on the banks of the Caspian, who braved smallpox in Persia, and has been burned black by the torrid heat of the Java Sea!—Dr. Michail Dorizas. (Pronounce his last name as if the "i" were a double "e.")

And when I asked him why he had left the routine of the schoolroom to undergo these things, he smiled and a far-away look came into his eyes, as he answered me:

"I wanted to see for myself before I undertook to teach. I wanted to know and feel and judge at first hand that of which I read in textbooks."

Forget for the moment that Dr. Michail Dorizas is a Doctor of Philosophy, and call him "Mike." Then jog your memory. Not so many years ago the name of "Mike" Dorizas was known to almost every man enrolled in an American college.

A giant in physical strength, at the age of eighteen, while a student at Robert College, in Constantinople, Michael Dorizas won the world's record in the javelin throw, and later on took part in three Olympic games as a representative of Greece.

Next, as an advanced student, he came to the University of Pennsylvania. In his first year he broke all records in the annual university strength tests by piling up 1,776 points against the previous high mark of 1,460. At subsequent tests he increased his total to 1,890 points, and then to 2,200 points, a figure never before dreamed of by strong men of college rank, and never equaled since.

At Pennsylvania, he established new records in shot-putting, discus and javelin throwing, and won his letter in football, track, and wrestling. Over a period of three years he won as many intercollegiate wrestling championships, throwing six men (two each year) in four minutes and twenty seconds, all told for the six—another record that has never been equaled.

He can take a man in his hands and lift him above his head as if the man were no more than a baby. The ability to perform this feat once saved his life, as we presently shall see. Today, at thirty-eight, he is 250 pounds of solid iron; has a chest that measures 48 inches, and has the agility of a cat.

"Mike" Dorizas delighting a group of Arabs by lifting their chief into the air. By a similar feat of strength Dorizas once saved himself when he was set upon by a Mongol bandit band. He tells the story of that encounter in this article

SO MUCH for "Mike" Dorizas, the athlete. But there are other sides to this school-teacher.

At eighteen, while he was breaking records with the javelin, he also was winning his first degree for scholarship and a place on the faculty of Robert College. Though scarcely more than a boy in years, he had made himself master of five languages—English, Greek, Turkish, French and Ancient Greek. He could also speak enough Russian and German to get along without an interpreter, and could understand Spanish. He was a geographer of more than passing ability.

Pennsylvania, and that famous college granted him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Then, this country entering the war, he went to France among the first to go over, as a member of an American hospital unit.

Almost immediately, his knowledge of the French language and people led to his assignment on a special mission to pick hospital sites for the army. Then came the Armistice, and he was summoned to the Peace Conference at Paris, to be placed on the American Section of the International Commission on Mandates in Turkey as the geographic and linguistic expert.

Few, if any, schools are more exacting in selecting faculty members than is the Wharton School of Finance, of the University of Pennsylvania. Since the war, Doctor Dorizas has been an instructor in the Geography Department of this famous school. He has written an authoritative book on the foreign trade of Greece, and has become widely known in scholastic circles as a most interesting lecturer. Most men would stop here, but not Dorizas!

HE IS a traveler, an explorer into the world's odd corners. Since boyhood he has roamed the earth, his only baggage that which he carried on his back, his only fortune that which he had earned in the classroom and on the lecture platform. Off to remote mountains and deserts and jungles avoided by the tourist and unheard of by the average man, Dorizas has gone afoot and by every kind of conveyance known—sleeping in the huts of peasants, pitching his hammock in barns, or spreading his sleeping-bag under the open stars.

I asked him where he had been, and then I had to stop him. I didn't want to set down a directory of the nations and places of the earth. So I turned the question around, and asked him where he had not been.

"That's easier," he granted. "I've been to every populated part of the world except Australia, New Zealand, Central and South Africa, and certain parts of interior Asia.

"But I'm young yet," he reminded me. "Come back four or five years from now, and I'll tell you that I've been in every land where man lives. I'm going, just as fast as I can raise the money."

Even as we talked he was making ready for his ninth trip into Russia. "I want to take a look at the new Germany, too," he said, "and perhaps at the new Poland."

He couldn't say, offhand, how many times he had crossed the ocean, or how many oceans he had crossed. "What does it matter?" he shrugged. "Can you say how many times you have been to New York?"

A Greek by blood, Dorizas was born in Constantinople, where his father was First Secretary of the Greek Legation. Some of his earliest teachers in that city, where he lived every winter, were Americans. And he was again in touch with American influence when he went to Robert College, an American college in Constantinople.

His summers were spent at the ancestral home of his family on the ancient island of Cephalonia, which is off the Gulf of Patras in the Ionian Sea. It is a stern and rugged island, frowned over by old Mt. Enos, and here Dorizas found new teachers in the Ionian fishermen and sailors, and in the hunters and shepherds of the hills. He learned to hunt and to climb mountain crags, to swim and to sail boats. Venturesome always, he sailed southward to Zante, and north as far as Corfu. He was becoming a man, a young giant! One day, as he pulled at the oars of a small boat in a rising sea, they snapped under the might of his stroke.

VACATION periods and holidays found him in out-of-the-way towns, and before he was sixteen years old he had made a journey by foot through the Balkans.

"Money? I needed but little," he explained to me. "Travel cost me nothing; for I walked. My bed cost me nothing, for I carried it on my back and pitched it on the ground. As for meals, a mountaineer wouldn't think of letting a stranger afoot pay him for hospitality, though he had but a crust of bread to share. The latchstring of the mountaineer is always out, not alone in the Balkans but in any part of the world."

There were Young Turks in Constantinople who talked of a New Turkey, and Young Russians (Continued on page 155)

"At Christmas play and make good cheer,
For Christmas comes but once a year—"

NOËL

MARGARET CULKIN BANNING'S story of a woman who had the Christmas spirit in her heart but found it not so easy to put it into practice

Illustrated by
JOSEPH SIMONT

IT WAS the first hour of Christmas, and the church was packed to its doors for the midnight service. Devout people, weary ones, those in search of a childhood memory, and unaccustomed onlookers, sat shoulder to shoulder in the oaken pews. Great, loose-leaved poinsettias flared on the altar among the candles, and the fresh scent of pine came from a grove of small spruce trees in which the crèche, with its plaster images of the nativity, had been placed. The voices of the choir rose high, with an almost unearthly sweetness, caroling.

Young Doctor Knight and his wife sat stiffly wedged together. They were mercilessly tired, and this hour of relief from activity was making them realize their exhaustion. But they always came to the midnight mass on Christmas Eve. "Always" meant five years to the Knights. Five years ago they had been here, Mary with a great bunch of violets tucked inside her coat and wearing the excited, conscious look of the bride. They had been married just a month on that first Christmas.

Now, after five years, they had left three children sleeping at home and their tired young shoulders leaned toward each other in common support. Mary's hat was a little awry and the doctor needed a shave. But they had been too hurried to bother much about how they looked.

The boxes to the out-of-town relatives were gone. No more standing in line before parcel-post windows. The shopping was done at last, that difficult, skillful shopping which meant spreading a little money so far that there would be a gift for each of the relatives and the children would have full stockings.

All the parcels were wrapped. The lights were on the tree. The Christmas candy was made and the chocolates dipped. The turkey was stuffed. It had cost an appalling amount, and Mary knew what planning it was going to take to keep next month's meat bill down so that the extravagance of nine dollars for a Christmas turkey might be appeased. It was going to take planning in all directions

The tears came to Mary's eyes as she thought of that first Mother and her Child in whose honor this day had been set aside to work in the Christmas bills. But there were chestnuts in the stuffing. Francis liked it that way. Everything was in order, and Christmas had really begun in joy and reverence.

The choir chanted it, the scent of the pine and incense mingled, the bell on the altar rang sweetly, and Mary and Francis knelt together. The doctor moved as if he roused himself, and, looking at her husband's face, Mary noted with pity the way fatigue dragged at it, lined it. He must get some sleep in the morning, and yet the children couldn't be hushed too much on Christmas morning.

Her double responsibility for his tiredness and the children's pleasure set her to planning how she would work it out. Christmas must be a perfect day for all of them. She was glad that they were beginning it like this. Her heart lifted with exaltation and peace, and for a moment she forgot how her weary nerves and muscles ached.

Outside it was clear and white and cold. People moving away from the church in steady lines of black figures called "Merry Christmas" to one another, and added that it would be twenty-five below before morning. Automobiles started reluctantly, their chilled engines numbed by two hours of the steady cold. Mary, pulling her coat around her closely—there were no violets under it tonight—hurried with her husband to their little enclosed car.

"I hope we aren't going to have any trouble getting started," she said. "Merry Christmas, Frank!"

He drew her arm through his own, returning her greeting affectionately.

"Beautiful night, isn't it? I guess she'll start all right. But it's certainly getting much colder."

Mary shivered against him while he pressed his foot on the starter.

"Now we'll see what the old car's made of."

The engine whirred, sprang to life, died, jumped again, turned over steadily at last.

The stars shone bright, as they should, and the snow crystals sparkled. A carol hummed in Mary's head. Two more miles and they'd be home and warm, with this beauty behind them and the children's fun ahead. But the car was making a great deal of noise.

"Aren't you running in second?" she asked Francis.

"First. I can't shift. She's cold."

The engine stormed and rattled for a few more blocks.

Frank made a valiant effort with the gear shift, and pushed it into second.

"I don't like that rattle."

Neither of them liked it. Something loose, something broken—an ominous sound, getting steadily worse.

He stopped and pulled on his brakes, and they glanced disconsolately at each other.

"We'll have to leave it and have it towed," said Mary unhappily.

BOTH of them knew what that meant: Ten dollars unexpected expense for towing the car into the garage, where something serious might be found wrong with it. The thought ground on the nerves of them both as Francis turned the wheels of the car into the curb and they abandoned it.

"The street car runs along, one block over there," he said. "Come on."

"You suppose there will be a car?"

"We can try. If not, we can call a taxi."

"Oh, Frank, we mustn't. It can't be more than a mile."

"Pretty cold for a stroll," he answered, trying to be amused, and failing.

She knew how cold it was. That still kind of cold that puts you off your guard because it is so windless, but numbs you slowly, parches your lips as you breathe.

"There must be a garage or drug store open to telephone from."

"Morks' will be. But that's only three blocks from home. Oh, let's not talk, Frank. Let's hurry! If we walk, a street car will probably catch up with us."

They started, bracing their weariness against the first few blocks, which were uphill. Mary faced ahead stoutly, then turned and tried to walk backward. She could feel her fingers aching already through the tips of her gloves. It hurt so she tried not to think of it. Such a beginning for Christmas!

No street car came. There was no sound except the crunching of their tired feet. It seemed a month of effort before they were at last within their own hallway, their faces red and distorted and a white patch on one of Mary's cheeks. Frank put snow on it.

"Poor old girl," he said, patting the frostbitten cheek.

"Oh, that's all right. It's the car and you. How are you going to manage your calls in the morning? Do you suppose it has anything really wrong with it?"

"Probably just needs thawing out. I'll telephone a wrecker now."

SHE heard him telephone the city for a wrecker while she was turning down his bed, and shook her head at the clock, which pointed reproachfully to three o'clock. In about three hours the children would be awake. Mary went in and softly adjusted the covers of the cribs. If only they'd sleep just a little longer than usual. Just long enough so her head would stop swimming and her eyes wouldn't feel as if someone were trying to push them back in her head.

At half-past three the house was silent. The stockings, bountifully filled, hung from the mantel of the living-room. The Christmas tree rustled imperceptibly as stray needles dropped from its branches to the red crêpe tissue paper laid at its base. Mary sat up in bed, and remembered that she had forgotten to put the candy canes on the trees—and she had promised Betty that there would be candy canes. Stealthily she wrapped her bathrobe around her and went down to hang three striped canes from the branches. Francis did not hear her go nor come back so wearily, her mind a churn of duties accomplished and duties to be started in the morning, her body too tired to relax into sleep.

The children woke relentlessly at six o'clock. Mary managed to keep them in bed until seven; but no longer. She woke Francis then. He was even more in need of a shave, and in his dressing-gown looked unkempt and haggard. But he lit the fire and the excitement began. It was a perfect picture of a family on Christmas morning, with Betty pulling a horn out of her stocking and Peter beating a drum, and the tree glittering in the corner with dozens of lights.

Pictorially, it was quite as it should be; but the picture of course blurred some details. The children were inclined to quarrel over possessions and difficult to interest in breakfast. The living-room was strewn with blocks and small toys within five minutes, and Mary found herself picking things up so that they wouldn't be stepped on, and then picking them up again.

But at last they all gathered at the table, Cathy, the baby, in her high chair beside her mother, and the general-housework maid serving in her usual careless manner. Jennie was not a good maid, but she was the best one Mary could afford, and she liked the children.

"We'll have dinner sharp at one, Frank," said Mary, "so that Jennie can go out. I promised her she'd be through by three-thirty. Have you a busy morning?"

"There's a lot of measles on the West Side," said Frank, "and I promised Allerby that I'd see what was on his list this morning. He's not going to make many calls today."

Mary said she supposed not. She had a grievance against this older doctor, who worked his assistant as Francis was worked, and showed no sign of giving him more recognition or more money.

"I suppose Doctor Allerby intends to spend Christmas with his family," she remarked, with just a trace of verbal acid. "Or possibly Mrs. Allerby's entertaining."

Francis looked at his wife quizzically, as if he knew perfectly what was going on in her mind, and used the customary defense:

"He's been through the mill, Mary. Don't forget that. He's reached a position now where he doesn't have to do the things younger doctors must do."

"I know. But it seems to me that, in justice—"

She remembered that it was Christmas, and broke off, torn between justice and good will to all men, even elder doctors. Francis grinned.

"Allerby intends to treat me all right, Mary. I'm sure of that."

"I wish I were."

"Well, you wait, old girl!"

"I do wait—but you get so tired with all he puts on you, and you won't push yourself, Frank."

"WHEN are we going to have the presents?" asked the doctor, with seeming irrelevance.

He didn't mean the children's early morning ones, but the family gift-giving, which was held around the Christmas tree after the relatives had gathered.

"After dinner. That's another reason for having it on time. You know how the children act later in the afternoon, and the baby will have to be put to bed as soon as it's over. You won't be late, will you?"

"You bet not! How do you feel this morning? Worn out after that walk?"

She shook her head bravely. Christmas was no time to confess to aching legs.

"I guess I'd better call up and see if the car's thawed out. If it is, I'll have them bring it around. It will cost a dollar more, but save me an hour."

"I'd do that. And I must get at the salad. Betty, you and Peter go (Continued on page 150)

To get thoroughly married takes

Time and Trouble

Says JUDGE RAYMOND MACNEILLE, who has heard thousands of domestic quarrels

By SHERMAN GWINN

ON a narrow, humble little Philadelphia street lived John and Anna Peters and their seven children. A shabby street, where every two-story red brick house was exactly like its neighbor; where of afternoons after school the air was filled with the din of playing urchins, and pennies meant what dollars do to most.

Peters I've called them, John and Anna Peters: it wouldn't be right to tell their real name, though it stands opposite the record of one of the strangest domestic dramas ever staged in an American court. John was a good workman, industrious, steady, and a kindly father—when he didn't drink. Anna washed, cooked, mended, cleaned. Handy with a needle, she sat up late to make her own and the children's clothes and little things for the house. It was a poor house, but it was home and Anna took pride in it. She had the spirit of sacrifice.

The Peterses came into Judge Raymond MacNeille's court one winter morning three years or more ago. Anna had never been in court before and knew nothing of judicial dignity and rules of evidence. All she knew was that the kindly, sympathetic man before her was the judge, and that somehow he seemed also to be her friend. She was in court to fight for her children and her home. And to give her courage she had brought the children with her.

"Can't you and John get along, Anna?" asked the judge. "You say he drinks, neglects his family, and beats you. Tell me all about it."

Anna's pale, thin face flushed a little. The children edged closer, clinging to her work-worn hands. John, the defendant, stood by with bowed head.

"Judge," Anna began, "drink is his curse. First along I forgave him, for he is a good man when he hasn't whisky; and he didn't drink so much then. But with each year he got worse. Drink made a fool of him. I begged him on my knees to let it alone, if not for my sake, for the children's; but he beat me and got drunk again. I prayed, Judge, for you see I have these little ones. I'm not here for myself but for them." Her voice rose tremulously. "For fifteen years I've taken his abuse without a whimper. I've gone without food. I've kept it from the neighbors out of shame. But I can't stand it any longer! For the sake of the babies, Judge, I've come to you because they told me you'd protect us and make John do right."

The reassuring, friendly voice of the judge broke the dead silence. "Yes, we will protect you," he said. "My investigators have looked into your charge and tell me it is true. Furthermore, Anna, they tell me you're a good woman, that you've suffered unjustly. I'm going to let you sit in judgment over your husband! I am going to let you impose the sentence!"

The woman's eyes lighted. "Do you mean that, Judge?"

"Every word of it," he declared. "This man has acted like a brute. He deserves no mercy, for he has given none. When his kind comes before me I'm sorry the law has done away with whipping posts—I'd like to give him a taste of his own medicine. But we still have jails and stone piles. Anna, his sentence is up to you. You are the one he has most wronged!"

John turned white. "Anna, Anna, please!" he cried. "I won't touch another drop! I won't do anything wrong again! Anna, don't be hard on me!"

"Silence!" directed the court. "Your wife is your judge."

Anna's jaw squared.

"The wrong has been done," she reminded her husband. "I begged you, as you now beg me, not once but a thousand times, and you didn't listen. Fifteen years it's been! I think you ought to have a year in jail! No, two years wouldn't be too much!"

"You are the judge," repeated the court. "Go on."

"Anna, please!" wailed the man, in utter terror.

"Come to think of it," snapped Anna, grim as a sphinx, "a life term wouldn't be too good for you. Fifteen years, Judge, fifteen! And I've never whimpered! That's a long time and this is my chance. Life imprisonment wouldn't be too much!"

JOHN collapsed in a chair. "I've never been in jail," he gasped. "Judge, don't send me there now! I'll do right from now on, so help me God!" He appealed to his wife: "Anna, so help me God, I'll do right!"

"Your plea comes too late," pronounced Judge MacNeille sternly. "The sentence is that you, John Peters, shall be confined for the remainder of your natural life in—"

The children were crying. John was crying. Suddenly the grimness left Anna's face.

"I'll take it back, Judge!" she cried. "I can't send him away! I take it back!"

"But you've already passed sentence," reminded the court. "That sentence is for life."

"No, no, Judge! I was carried away before I thought. I don't want him sent to jail. The best I could earn would be sixty-five cents a day. I can't bring up these young children on that. I can't, Judge. It wouldn't be fair. I don't want to break up our home!"

Judge MacNeille smiled. "Neither do I, Anna," he said kindlily. "It's our business to mend broken homes, not to break them up. I think we can mend yours. You are still the judge. What shall it be—sentence suspended?"

"Yes, Judge. Sentence suspended. I believe he'll do right."

"I will," pledged John earnestly.

Ten minutes later John and Anna Peters left the courtroom arm in arm. Three years and more have passed—John and Anna have not appeared in court again. Not long ago a court officer who visited them added to the record of their case:

"Settled. Doing well."

THE big thing that strikes you about Judge MacNeille is that he is human, alive, and knows people. Especially does he know the hearts of people—the boy in trouble, the wayward girl, the struggling mother, and the poor man bucking adversity.

"Justice costs too much for the poor," he once declared. "I'm going to make it free."

He did make it free by establishing in Philadelphia the "Poor Man's Court," wherein judge and attendants alike give their time and service, and justice may be had for the asking. It is a court of law, but more a court of reason. MacNeille puts reason first!

In a civil suit which came before him some years ago the right or wrong of the contention centered about the material constituting the roof of a building. One set of witnesses swore the roof was copper. The opposing witnesses swore the roof was tin. The law expected MacNeille to direct a verdict on that evidence. Instead he adjourned court, went to the building, borrowed a ladder and himself climbed up to the eaves. The roof was neither tin nor copper! It was composed of tar paper!

Judge MacNeille is only forty-nine. Yet during the fourteen years he has been on the bench in Philadelphia courts he has heard approximately 150,000 cases dealing primarily and fundamentally with the ups and downs of the American family. Many of these cases have come to him in the Domestic Relations Branch of the Municipal Court, of which he was the president judge, others in the Juvenile Branch of the same court, still others in the Poor Man's Court, which he founded five years ago; and in 1927 he began sitting as a judge in the Court of Common Pleas. In a single week he has heard as high as seven hundred actions, which is a record probably unequaled by any other American judge. He has reunited hundreds of homes.

A home mender! For three hours, the other day, I had Judge MacNeille talk to me about the home—of those things which most tend to make it happy, and of those which most endanger it. I had him talk of boys and girls, and of parents, and of his experiences in the Poor Man's Court—in the terms of actual cases handled, raw from the bin of life.

HE WAS born down in the neighborhood of Seventh and South streets, Philadelphia, which to anybody who knows Philadelphia will speak volumes. The Ghetto, with all its terrible congestion, poverty, and naked misery was on one side of him; "Little Italy" was on the other. He was reared "down-town," where blocks are filled with dingy courts that in turn hold dingier courts, and environment has a chance to do its worst. He was the leader of his gang of boys.

One day the letter carrier stopped in the furniture store conducted by MacNeille's father to announce that he wasn't going to carry any more mail.

"I'm a lawyer now," he said proudly. "Word came this morning that I passed the state examinations."

"But how did you ever find time to study law?" demanded Father MacNeille. "You have a job and a family."

Young Raymond awaited the answer open-mouthed. The letter carrier was one of his particular heroes.

"I studied when I wasn't carrying mail," the carrier explained. "A lawyer is a friend of mine. He helped me and loaned me books. I'm going into his office."

"You've done a great thing," pronounced Father MacNeille. "That's the kind of man I'd like my boy to be."

Judge MacNeille smiled as he told me this. "From that day," he said, "I resolved to become a lawyer."

He went on:

"I played lawyer among the boys. When disputes arose in the gang I jumped in to settle them if I could. I persuaded the boys to 'talk it out' rather than fight, for a fist fight usually leads to more trouble. However, if talk failed I refereed the battle. My ambition grew when I got into high school and studied subjects dealing with courts and government, and with this bent of mind I naturally became more interested in the troubles of folks than most boys or young men do. I was surprised at the number of troubles that had their beginning in the home.

"As to myself, I had a good home. I was under the influence of a soundly-thinking father and good mother. They didn't spoil me, but neither did they jail me up within a stone wall of 'don'ts.' Old-fashioned, church-going folks they were, but they understood boys. Their science of child rearing was common sense and reason.

"I believe it was the contrast between my own home and the homes of many of the boys I knew that crystallized my interest in the family life of youngsters. And I made a discovery: That good homes in the sense of homes that are good for the boy seldom turn out criminals and ne'er-do-wells, no matter what their neighborhood.

PHOTOGRAPH BY WM. SHEWELL ELLIS, PHILA.

Judge Raymond MacNeille is one of Philadelphia's most noted jurists. For some years he was the president judge of the Philadelphia Municipal Court, and five years ago he founded the "Poor Man's Court," where justice is administered free. Judge MacNeille was born in Philadelphia forty-nine years ago

"LATER, when I studied law in the office of an old friend, he hammered a mighty valuable precept into me.

"'Dig down to the root of the trouble,' he'd advise. 'Don't let the branches fool you, but dig to the root!'

"Adherence to that advice as a young lawyer showed me that the biggest mountain of trouble invariably has a mole-hill beginning. Today, after having sat as the judge in tens of thousands of cases, I can say with certainty that that is truer of the home than of any other place wherein trouble generates."

When the Municipal Court was formed in Philadelphia in 1914 Judge MacNeille was one of the original ten appointed to its bench. The court set a precedent in American jurisprudence. It didn't want masses of evidence. It sought the truth.

"Briefly, here is the court's procedure," Judge MacNeille explained: "When a case is listed actual hearing of it is deferred for a week. Impartial investigators of the court then go out and in unobtrusive ways interview neighbors, friends, and relatives of the contending parties. Their report is before the judge for his guidance when the case comes up in court. That report contains facts.

"Take an example:

"In one of my earlier cases a woman charged her husband with desertion and demanded support for herself and four children.

"'He makes forty dollars a week,' she testified.

"'Judge, I only make twenty dollars,' protested the husband. 'I have an affidavit from my employer to prove it.'

"He presented the affidavit. It seemed conclusive evidence, and would have been under the old methods. Our investigator, however, did more than talk with the man's employer. He went back over the pay roll for a year and discovered that the average pay of the husband had been thirty-eight dollars weekly. The reduction in pay to twenty dollars had been made after his wife had started action, and at the man's own request!

"Even honest testimony is fallible. In another action, (Continued on page 145)

I Wish I Were Somebody Else

By H. I. PHILLIPS

IT MUST be great to be a skywriter,
Or a subway,
Or an admiral,
Or a home-run king.
Or "Lindy,"
Or a male quartet,
Or what have you?

At least, that's the way it strikes me. Maybe it's indigestion, or the weather, or a lack of exercise. I dunno. All I know is that more than half the time I'm wishing I were some other fellow. In fact, I am often selfish enough to want to be two other fellows.

It's all wrong, of course, for it amounts to a form of envy; and envy is a thing with which no man should be caught on a bet. The truth is, you should pick out a goal, and go for it, never stopping to look at the other fellow unless the other fellow is a tackle. Most of my life, however, I have been running rapidly in all directions, which, perhaps, is why I have never got near enough to any goal line to tear up the posts.

There was a time when I thought I'd be a ventriloquist

Quick detachable ambitions have been the curse of my aching heart. I probably have one of the largest collections of slightly used and shopworn ambitions in the world.

One fine ambition in life is enough for any man. There ought to be a law prohibiting anybody from taking on more than two in a season. I've fished out as many as six in an afternoon. Many of them were undersized and should have been thrown back at once.

In fact, an ambition a day has often kept my contentment away.

Ever since I put on long pants and began to worry about food, clothes, and lodging, I have aspired to be one thing today and another tomorrow. Now it has become a habit. One day I think I should like to be like Thomas Edison; and the next day I think I should prefer to be the Four Marx Brothers. Monday morning may find me wishing I were Charles Schwab, the steel magnate, and Tuesday noon may see me peeved because I am not in the galoshes of Flo Ziegfeld, the well-known glorifier.

Yesterday I was in a blue funk all day. I couldn't make out why. It wasn't until late in the day that I suddenly realized what was wrong with me. The trouble was I had read that morning a statement of the earnings from "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," and was miserable because I couldn't write a book like Anita Loos. Tomorrow I may be in distress over the thought that I can never be like Nicholas Murray Butler, and day after tomorrow I may feel all's wrong with the world because I failed to pick the goal steadfastly aimed at by Gene Tunney.

I'd see a doctor about it if I didn't know there were so many people in the same boat with me. Wanting to be some other fellow is a pretty universal characteristic.

Sailors want to be park superintendents, and park superintendents want to be sailors. Miners want to be mountain climbers, and mountain climbers want to be miners. All tenors yearn to sing bass. Many a hard-headed captain of industry secretly wishes he could make as much money giving dancing exhibitions in a night club. The country is full of poets who would leap at a chance to be prosperous pork packers. Every subway worker would like to be pilot of the airplane mail.

There are reports that Eugene Tunney, heavyweight champion of the world, would really rather be a professor of English, if he could get two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year at the job. There are few professors of English who wouldn't change places with Tunney at the price. President Coolidge has admitted that his ambition for many years was to be a country storekeeper. Mayor James Walker of New York would like to be a great song writer.

A few days ago the proprietor of a garage and automobile service station where I had been keeping my flivver called me into his office, closed the door, and, hauling several manuscripts out of the safe, confessed that he wanted to write for the fiction magazines, and would I look over the stories and tell him where to send them.

It's a good thing there are no fairies wandering around with magic wands in their hands looking for work these days. They'd be mobbed by the rush of business!

Suppose one fine day I heard a flutter over beside the square piano and, turning, beheld a good fairy who pulled her union card on me, and spoke somewhat as follows:

"Now, don't be nervous. I'm just dropping around to call on the trade and take weekly orders. I've got a new wand here and I'm crazy to try it out. Would you like to be turned into somebody else?"

"Certainly, I want to be somebody else," I'd say. "Take a chair and make yourself comfortable. What's been detaining you? I've always wanted to be somebody else."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" suppose the good fairy would exclaim, as she began to strop her new wand.

"Wait a minute!" I'd cry. "Not so fast, G. F. If I tell you to go ahead and make me Senator Borah, do I have to stay that way?"

"Oh, yes; for quite some time, anyway," the good fairy might answer.

"Then it's all off," I know I'd reply. "At this precise moment I want to be Senator Borah; but tomorrow morning I might regard it as a great mistake and want to be the President of Mexico. No, lady, I can't give you any new business today. Try the fellow in the apartment next door. He's another silly goof who looks awfully unstable and restless."

You see, I'm too fickle. My idols have been at best "Good for only thirty days."

IF ALL the idols of my boyhood could be mobilized at one time, they would constitute a big parade, which would take several hours to pass any given point. There's hardly a career I haven't aspired to follow.

My first ambition in life, as nearly as I can remember, was to raise a goatee, let my hair grow long, and have my own Wild West Show and Congress of Nations. This came with my first glimpse of Buffalo Bill. Between that time and today, I have thought I'd like to be about everything, from a vaudeville hoofer to an evangelist.

I once resolved to be a ventriloquist, and spent many hours of practice in the attic asking myself in a loud voice, "Well, Charlie, how are you today?" And then answering myself through nearly set lips: "I'm pretty well. How are you?" I finally got so I could call to my imaginary partner down in the cellar, "Are you down there, Charlie?" and squeak with slightly twisted mouth a distant, "Yes, boss, I'm down here, and it's mighty cold," to the amazement of schoolmates, all of whom agreed it would be wonderful, if my Adam's apple didn't move so much.

Another time, I determined upon a career as a "lightning illustrator" in vaudeville. The idea being that some beautiful woman would sing a dramatic song about some battle, election, horse race, or social reform, while I would draw an appropriate picture in colors on a huge canvas, putting on the final stroke just as she concluded.

This notion fastened itself upon me after seeing an actor, one George Parsons, a well-known "variety" man of the era, do this stunt in Poli's Bijou Theatre. I was further intrigued by the fact that at one time Parsons had been a sign painter employed by my father, and had taught me as an infant to draw marine studies on a smoked plate. The plates were then shellacked and put on easels atop the square pianos of the day as supposedly artistic bric-à-brac. They were quite the thing in the era when every American home had at least one table made of spools.

FOR a period of several years, I thought it would be perfectly grand to follow in the footsteps of William Jennings Bryan, become a boy orator, stampede a convention or two, and always be mentioned as a Presidential possibility. Then, a few weeks later, I had about made up my mind to become the best snare drummer in town, like Dick Miller.

Between the ages of sixteen and nineteen, I determined at various times to become a press agent for a circus, a cartoonist, a buck-and-wing dancer, an actor, a prosecuting attorney, a druggist, a mortician, a hotel proprietor, an amusement park owner, a livery-stable owner, the boy wizard of a mail-order business, and a city politician.

I might as well confess all: I once wanted to be a floorwalker. I had a job in a local department store as a bundle boy, and my first glimpse of its floorwalker settled it; his was the grand manner. He had a walk that was nothing short of a work of art.

A little later, I thought something of becoming a saloon proprietor. It seemed to me that nearly everybody of affluence and standing in our town owned a saloon. There were about five to a block then, and some of our citizens used to think that the reformers were unreasonable whenever they would launch a campaign to limit bars to a half dozen per block, keep them from within two hundred feet of a church, college, or government building, and make them close all Sundays.

A career as a lightning illustrator in vaudeville once seemed the Big Thing, of course with a singing partner

When I first went to work, I had a notion that I would save enough money to open a bar somewhere near the center of town. I even used to think up names for it. I remember that I finally settled on "Albermarle Café" for no reason in particular, and pictured the big glass windows with the gilt letters:

THE ALBERMARLE CAFÉ
H. I. Phillips, Prop.
Ales, Wines, Liquors and Cigars
Try Our Free Lunch

This base ambition was kept a secret from my relatives and friends. After a time, I decided to keep my name off the windows and run it in the name of one of the bar boys. Ultimately, I grew more refined, gave up the idea of becoming a bar proprietor entirely, and considered a hotel as more respectable. I went so far as to go to work in a hotel, to "learn the business from the bottom up." But they put me too near the bottom.

IT WILL be appreciated that as a youth I did not hitch my wagon to a star. I traveled on roller skates instead of a wagon, anyhow.

I had no burning ideal, no flashing vision. All I wanted to do at that time was to get ahead. And I thought of getting ahead as arriving at a stage of affluence where I wouldn't have to get to work before eight o'clock, where I could work in my "Sunday clothes," and where I could wear one moderate-sized diamond in my shirtfront, and not be subject to any such crude threats as, "Hey, you! If you come in five minutes late again, I'll fire you!"

This picking of idols by the catch-as-catch-can system has been ever with me. Looking backward, I find that I was influenced in early youth largely by the impression made upon me by the outstanding local figures in my home town. I read as many circulars on (Continued on page 76)

J. H. Field, a photographer of Fayetteville, Arkansas, has won hundreds of prizes in national and international exhibitions. He was a carpenter, but his love for pictures lured him away from that trade. He made this portrait of himself

PRIZES in themselves don't mean much to me. The big thrill comes when they hang my pictures in the exhibits."

This is the way J. H. Field, a quiet little photographer in Fayetteville, Arkansas, feels about it. Already he has won more than three hundred photographic prizes in national and international exhibits and his name ranks high among the camera fraternity.

"When I won my first prize," he told me, "I knew practically nothing about photography; but I did know that I wanted to get away from the microscopic sharpness of the ordinary photograph. Softness, mystery, the intrigue of light and shade—these were the elusive qualities that I sought, and I worked away in my own crude fashion until I obtained them to a certain degree.

"One day a traveling salesman for photographic supplies dropped in and saw some of my pictures. He thought they were unusual and encouraged me to exhibit them at a photographers' convention to be held in Milwaukee.

"It was a big national photographers' association, and I was scared to death to send in my amateur efforts; but—nothing venture, nothing have.

"IMAGINE my surprise and delight when I was awarded second prize, a bronze medal, in my class. Later some magazines printed a few of my pictures and spoke flatteringly of their composition, their beautiful atmospheric effects, and their fine tone values. All this was so much Greek to me; so I bought some books on photography to find out what they were talking about.

"I was a carpenter by trade, and night after night, after my day's work of carpentering was done, I sat up and read them. And the more I read the more I hankered to give up my job as a carpenter and become a photographer.

"Finally I raked up enough money to pay my tuition in a photographer's gallery in Waupun, where I was then living. I learned a good many tricks of the trade, including developing, finishing, retouching. But my employer's methods of taking photographs were very antiquated. Two clasps were used on the victim, in order to secure the right pose—one behind the ears, the other about the neck. He was then commanded to "look pleasant." I put in a year's apprenticeship, then I worked for him for a few months at a dollar a day.

An American boy—one of Mr. Field's portrait studies

"BUT I wanted my own studio. I felt I could do better alone, and I was beginning to have vague ideas about the kind of photographs and pictures I wished to take. I found a photographer at Berlin, Wisconsin, who was willing to sell for six hundred dollars. I didn't have that much money, but I managed to borrow one hundred dollars one place, seventy-five dollars another, and so on until I had the whole amount.

"Of all years to begin, I picked out the panic year following the World's Fair in Chicago! Things were mighty close, and I was young, green, and tender. Sometimes I was nearly sick wondering how to pay the rent and the very small stock bills. But the tide turned. Business picked up. I managed to pay my debts and finally to save a little. However, up to this time I had been turning out nothing but just 'bread and butter' photographs.

"These didn't satisfy me at all. In fact, the ordinariness of my own photographs filled me with disgust and chagrin. There was nothing in them to arouse the imagination, and I knew I could do much better work.

"IT SO happened that I wasn't feeling any too well physically, and my doctor advised me to be in the open air as much as possible. As a boy, my taste ran to flowers and trees. I spent all my spare time in the woods and fields. So when the doctor told me to get out more, out I went; but this time my camera went with me.

"When I saw a bit of nature that appealed to me I would experiment with the camera. Instead, for instance, of shutting the lens down to the last notch, I used it wide open. I printed from the back of the glass negative and got a very soft effect. Sometimes I placed a piece of celluloid, or two or three, between the print paper and the negative. The results were quite pleasing. Occasionally I substituted a piece of tissue paper, or chiffon, or bolting cloth, maybe a combination of all three, in order to get the effect I was after. I have even jarred or kicked the tripod during a long exposure just at sunset, and got some beautiful results. However, I don't recommend this last method, because there is no certainty that you can give the correct kick or jar.

"In my small way I was striving to put 'feeling' into my pictures. And now and then I would turn out something that convinced me I was on the right track.

"There was no one in my small town who could help me with my work, so I bought more books and plugged along at them by myself.

"ONE day I attended the Photographers' Association Convention in Chicago, at which John Vanderpool, head of figure drawing at the Art Institute, was the principal speaker. Naturally, with the rest of the photographers, I had a little collection of pictures on display. Vanderpool, after viewing the various collections, took mine up to the platform with him. He said a lot of good things about my work and also pointed out a number of faults. But when he concluded his talk by telling his audience to 'Go home and make pictures like Mr. Field's,' I thought my cup of joy would overflow.

"After that marvelous incentive I settled down to business in earnest, and enrolled in a course with a New York painter. I got a great deal of good out of it. I have always been handicapped in not having had art instruction. All the big photographers know a lot about art. I can only 'feel' it out.

"I suppose at the bottom of what reputation I may have attained is my love for nature. Some people go into ecstasies over a handful of diamonds, but I find rarer beauty in the sun-kissed dewdrops on a spider web in early morning—nature's jewels. When I look into a mud puddle I don't see the mud. Instead, I see reflected in its depth the beautiful curves of some weeds or wild grasses growing over at one side, or the fluffiness of floating clouds overhead. I look for the sparkling high lights on its sun-flecked surface or for the sinuous line of dazzling silver found where water and damp earth meet. There may be seven-jeweled dragon flies darting back and forth above it, or graceful water spiders skimming over its copper-colored surface! Why look for mud? Then I try to photograph the things as I see them.

"MY FAVORITE time to be out snapping with my camera is in the early morning, when the mists soften the harsh outlines and give a lure and mystery to even the most ordinary subjects. A painter can give an illusion of atmosphere with color, but a photographer has to get his out of lights and shadows.

"Haven't you noticed how, in the half light, with all the multitudinous details blurred or hidden, you get a sense of space? Even ugly things take on a strange, eerie beauty; tall chimneys become campaniles, and warehouses palaces. Only the other day a friend mistook an early morning picture of a filling station for that of a Grecian temple. But a few minutes after the picture was taken the sun had arisen, and the shadows and mists that gave it so much beauty had faded; the bas-reliefs of the frieze which ran around the temple beneath the cornice had turned into an electric-light sign; the Parthenon top had been transformed into a peaked tile roof; the Doric columns were simply sturdy concrete posts; the gods and goddesses had become gasolene and oil pumps; the vestals were mechanics in greasy overalls —and a truck was squawking madly out in front for service.

"ONE of my pictures, which I call 'Ghosts of Summer,' won several prizes and is a general favorite. It is three gone-to-seed dandelions stuck in a peanut-butter jar. I secured my effects by turning a high-powered light upon the stems which glistened on the rims of the glass jar, and cast delicate fluffy shadows upon a light background. Another of my prize-winning pictures, and one of the best I ever took, was that of a pond which had been dug up by a farmer a week or so before, and which was only about fifty feet square. I focused my camera on the sun's rays in the mud, managing, at the same time, to pick up the high lights along the opposite edge. The result resembles the curve in a mighty river, the sunlight dancing and glistening upon its waves, with faint trees in the distance.

"Nearly every Sunday I'm out all day long, rain, shine, or snow; walking anywhere from five to thirty miles. Sometimes I lug my camera over my shoulder but often I leave it at home. I go out just for the joy of it, and browse around, picking out places that will make good pictures under the right conditions.

"But it is often hard to make time and conditions meet. An instant too soon, an instant too late may spoil a perfect photograph. There is a certain time when the light will be just right, when the shadows will lie just as you want them. If you are there then, you will get your picture. I make dozens and dozens of trips before I get the thing I'm after. Sometimes a cloud floats over the sun at the wrong time. This may mean days and days of delay, until conditions are just right again.

"For instance, while I still had my studio in Berlin, Wisconsin, I wanted to take a photograph of a landscape with trees, a marsh, and a certain cloud effect. The place I had in mind was two and a half miles out of town. Every time a cloud formed near the marsh I grabbed my camera and ran. I kept my weather eye out of my window for weeks.

"I made exactly thirteen trips, snapping a plate or two each time, before I got the right effect.

"Another time I had been out chasing a herd of cattle all one hot July morning, waiting for them to get stretched out into a line that would be a proper arrangement for my picture. Finally, about noon, they grouped themselves just the way I wanted them to.

"While I was adjusting my camera, with my head beneath the cloth, a woman came running down over the hill crying and yelling at the top of her voice and frightened all the cows away. She hurried up to me, all out of breath, and panting, 'They won't hurt you at all. Don't mind them a bit.'

"That picture is still on the waiting list." (The End)

Barton Cooper, of San Diego, California, can't keep his "eye on the ball," but he plays excellent golf just the same

Not Even the Hazard of Blindness Can Beat This Boy Golfer

IF YOU have ever played golf, you know how much depends upon the accuracy of your eye and the skill with which you control your shots. If you have never played the game, you can get some notion of it by imagining yourself trying to drive a little ball from a starting place to a little hole from somewhere around one hundred and twenty-five to six hundred yards away. The idea is to get the ball to its destination with only three to five strokes.

You need perfect control of your muscles, the ability to judge exactly how far the ball will go if hit only so hard, and, especially, you need your eyes. Indeed, "Keep your eye on the ball" is one of the axioms of golf.

Yet one of the best players on the San Diego Municipal Golf Links in California is a blind boy thirteen years old. His name is Barton Cooper, and he is the son of Lieutenant W. S. Cooper of the United States Navy.

On the San Diego municipal course, an average golfer, under usual conditions, will knock the little white ball around the course and into all nine holes en route in somewhere between fifty and sixty strokes.

I saw Barton do it in forty-three, under the stimulus of showing off. This is only four strokes over par.

"If he ever gets it on the green"—the smoothed-off circular space around the hole—"you might as well concede him the hole in not more than two putts," a professional player at the links assured me. I saw him sink plenty of putts—and he never took more than two strokes. He has the caddy rattle the pin in the cup. From the sound, he gauges the direction, the distance, and the effort he must make in order not to overshoot the hole.

It is worth any golfer's while to watch Barton get ready for a long shot. First, he carefully tees up his ball. Next, he runs his hand down the length of his club, preparatory to setting the club head about an inch back of the tee. He is now ready to take his stance. At this point, his caddy "tells him the direction of the next hole" by placing his arm across the boy's chest and squaring his shoulders around until they are on a line with the hole. After Barton is all set, the caddy describes the slopes in the fairway and any hazards to be encountered.

Barton rarely hits over or under the ball. Sometimes, however, because the caddy has not been accurate in lining him up, he will drive the ball off at the wrong angle. After Barton has shot from the tee, the caddy locates the ball, leads the boy to it, and the two proceed to line up and start all over again.

Besides being a little more than an average golfer for his age—even if he had his eyesight—Barton is alert and active generally. He plays the piano, operates a typewriter, and is a sophomore in a high school for boys, where he meets exactly the same conditions and requirements as are met by boys with eyesight. At present, he is learning to swim.

"But I like golf better than anything," he told me. "I first played in the summer of 1925, when I was about ten. My father was playing a round with some friends. The sound of the clubs on the ball, and the whirr of the balls through the air thrilled me.

"One day I asked my father to let me try to 'sink a putt.' You know that is the short shot you make after you are on the green, or within at least fifteen feet of the cup—or hole. I don't believe Father thought I could do it; but he let me have the club. I asked the caddy to rattle the pin in the cup.

"I was accustomed to depending on sound for direction, so locating the cup was not as hard for me as you would think. I didn't know how hard to hit the ball in order to send it the right distance. I swung the club lightly to get the weight of it in my mind. Then I tapped the ball. My father seemed to get a big thrill out of it. I did, too, when he told me I had sunk the ball.

"From then on, I have been crazy about golf.

"The hard part came when I began trying to drive—to make the first long shots you take in trying to get from the tee, or starting point, down to the cup. My first drive was 175 yards."

The day I played with Barton—and he beat me—I saw Barton make a drive of around 200 yards.

After I had got acquainted with him and won his confidence, Barton told me why he likes to play golf so very much.

"Other boys can enjoy adventures," he said. "Golf is my adventure.

"The only trouble I have is that people are too kind to me. It is necessary, of course, for me to rely on my caddy a lot. On the long drives before I get to the green, he has to tell me in just what direction to drive and how far to drive. I am glad you saw that long drive I made a moment ago. Some find it hard to believe.

"My first caddy used to pick the ball up and carry it a few yards farther, just to encourage me. I didn't like that, because I want to make my scores honestly. When I found out he was doing this, I got another caddy. He felt sorry for me too. So now I have a caddy that I have checked up on. He makes me win every foot of the way, and you bet your life he doesn't roll the ball into the cup when it stops an inch or two short."

Barton was born in Alameda, California, thirteen years ago. Until he reached high school he went to a Braille school in Los Angeles. There he learned to use a typewriter and to read by the Braille system. He makes all his school notes on a Braille typewriter."

After Fifty Years of Waiting Margaret Mann's Dreams Came True

ONE lovely summer, fifty-five years ago, a little lassie sat perched on the sturdy shoulders of her father beside a village road in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. The child's heart beat excitedly, for she had come to watch the Queen pass by. Since early morning, she and her father had waited; and now at any moment Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, was due to drive through the village in her grand state carriage on her way to her summer castle at Balmoral.

It was a great day in the little Scotch girl's life. The Queen's benign face and her kindly manner as she acknowledged the greetings of her humble subjects made a profound impression on the child's mind.

And now, more than half a century later, the thousands of folks who love Margaret Mann in the "mother" rôles which she has made famous in motion pictures say that the stately actress looks like the late Queen Victoria. If you have seen Miss Mann in her latest success, "Four Sons," you can settle that question for yourself. At any rate, you will rejoice that this valiant-hearted woman has come into her own, at the age of fifty-nine, after years of poverty, bitter disappointment, and failure.

"We were very poor," she explained. "My father had a little factory in Aberdeen where he made carpet shoes—bedroom slippers, you call them here. He worked hard too, but it was almost impossible for him to support his large family, even though we lived in a small village outside of the larger town.

The door to movie fame opened for Margaret Mann when, at fifty-nine, she was given the rôle of the mother in "Four Sons"

"When I was nine years old, I had to leave school and make my own way. My father sent me to the farm of a cousin near our village. Here, I did all sorts of heavy work: I milked the cows, fed the pigs, and tended the sheep. And when it was necessary I took my place behind the plow. So far as I am able to see, all this hard work didn't hurt me a bit. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if my training in physical endurance in those days isn't the very thing that enables me to stand up under the strain of screen work now.

"As I grew older, I learned the dressmaking trade and managed to save up a little money. I soon decided to try my luck in a younger land, for there weren't many opportunities in Scotland in those days for a girl to get ahead. I bought a ticket for South Africa; I suppose because I knew less about that country than about any other. But it was a lucky thing for me that I went there, for it was in Johannesburg that I met the man who afterward became my husband."

After her marriage to James F. Smythe, a young accountant, Margaret continued her work as a dressmaker. Her husband earned a good salary; but there were many things to buy for the new home, and Margaret wanted to "help out." Two children came to them, a boy and a girl; but they both died while they were very young.

"After that," Miss Mann explained, "I didn't want to go on living in South Africa. I wanted to find new work to do—in a new country. It was hard on my husband when I asked him to give up a good job and risk the money we had both saved. But he wanted me to be happy, so we set sail for the United States."

The couple landed in Philadelphia, but they did not remain there long. They kept on clear across the continent to Washington State, where they lived for a number of years. Later, however, Mr. Smythe's work took him to San Diego, and the two set about building a new home in the California sun.

"While I was living in San Diego," she told me, "I was asked to impersonate Martha Washington in a pageant. I loved doing it. My friends were kind enough to say that I did it very well. Many persons, most of them strangers, suggested that I ought to go into motion-picture work. But that wasn't possible at the time.

"Five years later, however, Mr. Smythe was offered a position in Los Angeles. With only one photograph of myself, I started out walking from one studio to another. It wasn't a particularly encouraging pilgrimage. I was fifty years old then, and I don't believe I could have kept on trying if it hadn't been for my husband. I believe that any woman who goes to Hollywood with no income or with nobody to look after her is bound to meet failure. Extra work is precarious—even for the youngest and prettiest.

"One day a director discovered that I was what they call a 'type.' He gave me a bit of work. After a while, I was given another bit at a different studio. Of course the parts were only tiny ones, but, thanks to my plowing days, I still had lots of energy. And I used it all trying to do my best. Little by little I became more experienced, more restrained; and, in a few years, I was playing substantial rôles.

"But in 1924 my world turned upside down. I lost the little success I had earned. Moving-picture audiences didn't want old white-haired mothers on the screen any more. They wanted young mothers, sophisticated mothers. And so I could find little to do."

Hard times fell on the Smythe household. Unemployment was general in motion pictures. Margaret was forced to drop back into the "extra" ranks from which she had so painfully climbed.

Then, one day—after months of silence—she received a call from the studio to work on a picture called "Mother Machree." She had only a bit, as usual. But she performed it to the limit of her capacity. The director was impressed, so impressed that he never forgot her. And when he was casting for the part of Grandmother Bernie in "Four Sons," he remembered her and gave her the leading part.

At last her hard work was rewarded, for her success in this new film has been tremendous. And the best witness of the fact is the contract which she recently signed—a contract which makes the fifty-nine-year-old woman a moving-picture star and provides her with a salary far beyond her wildest dreams.

"Piggy" Shows What a Small-Town Editor Can Do

Granville Barrere, or "Piggy," as his friends call him, has done more to help his town than any other man in Hillsboro, Ohio

DOWN home, when we were kids, we called him "Piggy," because he was so darned pig-headed. He was a gangling, awkward-looking kid. When he thought he was in the right, he'd fight and cuss and throw things, no matter how big the other fellow was.

His name is Granville Barrere. The Barreres came into Ohio just after the Revolution and settled at New Market, which was the big town before Cincinnati was. A Barrere ran the inn there. The capital of that district was moved to Hillsboro, and his son, George Washington, became owner of the "News-Herald" there. I learned the trade of newspaper man in the "News-Herald" office.

Piggy studied at Ohio State University, and went to New York to practice law. When his father died, he went back to run the paper, and he was just as pig-headed as ever. He believed Hillsboro was the most beautiful town in the country and the best place in which to live—which, of course, all we folk from there know. He wanted it to be even better, however. Almost every small town has a crank like that, someone who wants to do something to improve his town, and who sacrifices himself and gets in bad with almost everyone just by trying to help them.

Every year Piggy sets himself and his paper to some task of improving conditions in the town. He gets mad, fights, argues, cusses, and usually puts it over. Seven years ago he tackled the biggest job of his career.

Like most of those beautiful, quiet, small towns, the political gangs ruled this one, and almost ruined it. The finances were in terrible shape, for the town was practically bankrupt, with no sign of relief.

The waterworks was a junk heap, and the wells and pumps could not furnish water enough to supply the town. Sometimes the supply was shut off for days at a time. Sometimes they had to pump from Clear Creek and try to purify the water. There was little if any fire protection. The streets were in terrible condition. The Business Men's Association knew that conditions were hopeless unless the old, grafting political gang was driven out. They wanted a city manager, but could not have one until the people voted on it, a year later.

Piggy determined to straighten up the mess when he found that the waterworks bonds—issued many years before—had been forgotten. They did not repudiate them; they just let them go, as there was no money. He got the idea of a non-partisan business administration.

The idea went over. Piggy used his paper to work up enthusiasm over the plan, and every business man in town agreed. Then the committee met, hand-picked the most prominent and successful business men, and put them on the ticket. Every one of them roared and refused to serve.

"I'm too busy," they protested, or, "I can't neglect my business."

"We don't want loafers," replied the committee.

Piggy carried copies of the pledge to serve and handed them to the business men. They surrendered and kept their pledge.

The committee then waited on the political bosses and read the riot act to them. With all the business men in town united, and with nine of the best men on the citizens' ticket, the bosses wilted. The Republicans did not nominate anyone, while the Democrats put up only a couple of candidates.

The result was as follows: Floating indebtedness paid off; the waterworks bonds paid; waterworks rebuilt; new pumps and reservoir built; air pressure machinery installed; waterworks paying a dividend instead of borrowing money every year; fine paved streets; the fire department reorganized and motor machinery bought; the public library, which had not bought a new book in ten years, reorganized and brought up to date in every particular. Nor was there any increase in the tax rate; rather, it has been decreased twice.

This year, Piggy decided the year's work should be to build a playground, swimming pool and recreation field for the boys and girls of the town. He knew that it was badly needed, and believed that such a plant would encourage town loyalty, teach sportsmanship and provide clean, healthy amusement for the people, as well as give the boys and girls some incentive to stay in the old home town.

He put it over, too. It was a desperate fight, because so many of the older generation still regard sports and games as "foolishness."

Why this soup is extra-rich in vegetable goodness!

At pickaback I never lack
To strut my manly stride.
All-comers fear when I am near
With Campbell's Soup inside!

FIFTEEN fine garden vegetables in one soup! That sounds surprising, doesn't it? How many women have the time to make soup with so many different vegetables in it? Just think of the trouble, too—all the marketing to do, all the tedious preparation of the vegetables, all the cooking that keeps you tied to your kitchen, and all the expense. But there's really no need to deprive your family of such a richly supplied, hearty, healthful vegetable soup. For Campbell's offer it to you already cooked and laden with the choicest vegetables that grow.

As vegetables are often cooked in the home kitchen, the cooking water is thrown away. Yet this water has absorbed valuable mineral salts from the vegetables. But this is not so with well-made Vegetable Soup, for it blends the vegetables in a rich liquid that contains their goodness in its full strength.

So you see why Campbell's Vegetable Soup is such a beneficial way to eat vegetables. It contains such good vegetables and so many of them, in all their natural abundance of health-giving qualities.

Here in one soup is such a generous quantity of hearty, substantial food that women everywhere call it "a meal". In thousands and thousands of homes it is frequently eaten as the luncheon or supper. It is so convenient! Add an equal quantity of water, bring to a boil, simmer a few minutes. It's then all ready.

And the children! Don't they just love to dodge the vegetables! They always have one eye cocked on the dessert. Yet they are the very ones who most need the health-promoting vegetable foods. It's a real relief to see how eagerly they eat Campbell's Vegetable Soup.

Your grocer has, or will gladly get for you, any of the 21 Campbell's Soups listed on each label. 12 cents a can.

The Bishop Murder Case

with papers, and it was obvious that we had disturbed him in the midst of his labors.

"Why this unexpected visit, Markham?" he asked, after we had seated ourselves. "Have you something to report on Robin's death?" He marked a page in Weyl's "Space, Time and Matter" and, settling back reluctantly, regarded us with impatience. "I'm very busy working on a problem of Mach's mechanics. . . ."

"I regret," said Markham, "I have nothing to report on the Robin case. But there has been another murder in this neighborhood today, and we have reason to believe that it may be connected with Robin's death. What I wanted particularly to ask you, sir, is whether or not the name of John E. Sprigg is familiar to you."

Professor Dillard's expression of annoyance changed quickly.

"Is that the name of the man who was killed?" There was no longer any lack of interest in his attitude.

"Yes. A man named John E. Sprigg was shot in Riverside Park, near Eighty-fourth Street, this morning shortly after half past seven."

The professor's eyes wandered to the mantelpiece, and he was silent for several moments. He seemed to be debating inwardly some point that troubled him.

"Yes," he said at length, "I—we—do know a young man of that name—though it's wholly unlikely he's the same one."

"Who is he?" Markham's voice was eagerly insistent.

Again the professor hesitated.

"THE lad I have in mind is Arnesson's prize student in mathematics—what they'd call at Cambridge a senior wrangler."

"How do you happen to know him, sir?"

"Arnesson has brought him to the house here several times. Wanted me to see him and talk to him. Arnesson was quite proud of the boy; and I must admit he showed unusual talent."

"Then he was known to all the members of the household?"

"Yes. Belle met him, I think. And if by 'the household' you include Pyne and Beedle, I should say the name was probably familiar to them too."

Vance asked the next question.

"Did the Drukkers know Sprigg, Professor Dillard?"

"It's quite possible. Arnesson and Drukker see each other a great deal. . . . Come to think of it, I believe Drukker was here one night when Sprigg called."

"And Pardee: did he also know Sprigg?"

"As to that I couldn't say." The professor tapped impatiently on the arm of his chair, and turned back to Markham. "See here"—his voice held a worried petulance—"what's the point of these questions? What has our knowing a student named Sprigg to do with this morning's affair? Surely you don't mean to tell me that the man who was killed was Arnesson's pupil!"

"I'm afraid it's true," said Markham. There was a note of anxiety—of fear almost, I thought—in the professor's voice when he next spoke.

"Even so, what can that fact have to do with us? And how can you possibly connect his death with Robin's?"

"I admit we have nothing definite to go on," Markham told him. "But the purposelessness of both crimes—the total lack of any motive in either case—seems to give them a curious unity of aspect."

"You mean, of course, that you have found no motive. But if all crimes without apparent motive were assumed to be connected—"

"Also there are the elements of time and proximity in these two cases," Markham amplified.

"Is that the basis of your assumption?" The professor's manner was benevolently contemptuous. "You never were a good mathematician, Markham, but at least you should know that no hypothesis can be built on such a flimsy premise."

"Both names," interposed Vance, "—Cock Robin and Johnny Sprigg—are the subjects of well-known nursery rhymes."

THE old man stared at him with undisguised astonishment; and gradually an angry flush mounted to his face.

"Your humor, sir, is out of place."

"It is not my humor, alas!" replied Vance sadly. "The jest is the Bishop's."

"The Bishop?" Professor Dillard strove to curb his irritation. "Look here, Markham; I won't be played with. That's the second mention of a mysterious Bishop that's been made in this room; and I want to know the meaning of it. Even if a crank did write an insane letter to the papers in connection with Robin's death, what has this Bishop to do with Sprigg?"

"A paper was found underneath Sprigg's body bearing a mathematical formula typed on the same machine as the Bishop notes."

"What!" The professor bent forward. "The same machine, you say? And a mathematical formula? . . . What was the formula?"

Markham opened his pocketbook, and held out the triangular scrap of paper that Pitts had given him.

"The Riemann-Christoffel tensor. . . ." Professor Dillard sat for a long time gazing at the paper; then he handed it back to Markham. He seemed suddenly to have grown older; and there was a weary look in his eyes as he lifted them to us. "I don't see any light in this matter." His tone was one of hopeless resignation. "But perhaps you are right in following your present course.—What do you want of me?"

Markham was plainly puzzled by the other's altered attitude.

"I came to you primarily to ascertain if there was any link between Sprigg and this house; but, to be quite candid, I don't see how that link, now that I have it, fits into the chain. I would, however, like your permission to question Pyne and Beedle in any way I think advisable."

"Ask them whatever you like, Markham. You shall never be able to accuse me of having stood in your way." He glanced up appealingly. "But you will, I hope, advise me before you take any drastic steps."

"That I can promise you, sir." Markham rose. "But I fear we are a long way from any drastic measures at present." He held out his hand, and from his manner it was evident he had sensed some hidden anxiety in the old man and wanted to express his sympathy without voicing his feelings.

THE professor walked with us to the door.

"I can't understand that typed tensor," he murmured, shaking his head. "But if there's anything I can do . . ."

"There is something you can do for us, Professor Dillard," said Vance, pausing at the door. "On the morning Robin was killed we interviewed Mrs. Drukker—"

"Ah!"

"And though she denied having sat at her window during the forenoon there is a possibility she saw something happen on the archery range between eleven and twelve."

"She gave you that impression?" There was an undertone of suppressed interest in the professor's question.

"Only in a remote way. It was Drukker's statement that he had heard his mother scream, and her denial of having screamed, that led me to believe that she might have seen something she preferred to keep from us. And it occurred to me that you would probably have more influence with her than anyone else, and that, if she did indeed witness anything, you might prevail upon her to speak."

"No!" Professor Dillard spoke almost harshly; but he immediately placed his hand on Markham's arm, and his tone changed. "There are some things you must not ask me to do for you. If that poor harassed woman saw anything from her window that morning, you must find it out for yourself. I'll have no hand in torturing her; and I sincerely hope you'll not worry her either. There are other ways of finding out what you want to know." He looked straight into Markham's eyes. "She must not be the one to tell you. You yourself would be sorry afterward."

"WE MUST find out what we can," Markham answered resolutely but with kindliness. "There's a fiend loose in this city, and I cannot stay my hand to save anyone from suffering—however tragic that suffering may be. But I assure you I shall not necessarily torture anyone."

"Have you thought," asked Professor Dillard quietly, "that the truth you seek may be more frightful even than the crimes themselves?"

"That I shall have to risk. But even if I knew it to be a fact, it would not deter me in any degree."

"Certainly not. But, Markham, I'm much older than you. I had gray hair when you were a lad struggling with your logs and antilogs; and when one gets old one learns the true proportions in the universe. The ratios all change. The estimates we once placed on things lose their meaning. That's why the old are more forgiving: they know that no man-made values are of any importance."

"But as long as we must live by human values," argued Markham, "it is my duty to uphold them. And I cannot, through any personal sense of sympathy, refuse to take any avenue that may lead to the truth."

"You are perhaps right," the professor sighed. "But you must not ask me to help you in this instance. If you learn the truth, be charitable. Be sure your culprit is accountable before you demand that he be sent to the electric chair. There are diseased minds as well as diseased bodies; and often the two go together."

WHEN we had returned to the drawing-room Vance lighted a cigarette with more than his usual care.

"The professor," he said, "is not at all happy about Sprigg's death; and, though he won't admit it, that tensor formula convinced him that Sprigg and Robin belong to the same equation. But he was convinced dashed easily. Now, why? Moreover, he didn't care to admit that Sprigg was known hereabouts. I don't say he has suspicions, but he has fears. . . . Deuced funny, his attitude. He apparently doesn't want to obstruct the legal justice which you uphold with such touchin' zeal, Markham; but he most decidedly doesn't care to abet your crusade where the Drukkers are concerned. I wonder what's back of his consideration for Mrs. Drukker. I shouldn't say, offhand, that the professor was of a sentimental nature. And what was that platitude about a diseased mind and a diseased body? Sounded like a prospectus for a physical culture class, what? . . . Lackaday! Let's put a few questions to Pyne and kin."

Markham sat smoking moodily. I had rarely seen him so despondent.

"I don't see what we can hope for from them," he commented. "However, Sergeant, get Pyne in here."

When Heath had stepped out Vance became suddenly sober. "We're dealing with unknown quantities here. We're pitted against some strange, abnormal force that doesn't operate according to the accepted laws of conduct. It's at once subtle—oh, no end subtle—and unfamiliar. But at least we know that it emanates from somewhere in the environs of this old house; and we must search in every psychological nook and cranny. Somewhere about us lies the invisible dragon. So don't be shocked at the questions I shall put to Pyne. We must look in the most unlikely places. . . ."

Footsteps were heard approaching the archway, and a moment later Heath entered with the old butler in tow.

XI

THE STOLEN REVOLVER

(Monday, April 11th; 3 p. m.)

"SIT down, Pyne," said Vance, with peremptory kindness. "We have permission from Professor Dillard to question you; and we will expect answers to all our questions."

"Certainly, sir," the man answered. "I'm sure there's nothing that Professor Dillard has any reason to hide."

"Excellent." Vance lay back lazily. "To begin with, then; what hour was breakfast served here this morning?"

"At half past eight, sir—the same as always."

"Were all the members of the family present?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"Who calls the family in the morning? And at what time?"

"I do, myself—at half past seven. I knock on the doors—"

"And wait for an answer?"

"Yes, sir—always."

"Now think, Pyne: did everyone answer you this morning?"

The man inclined his head emphatically. "Yes, sir."

"And no one was late to breakfast?"

"Everyone was on time promptly—as usual, sir."

Vance leaned over and deposited his cigarette ash in the grate.

"Did you happen to see anyone leaving the house or returning to it this morning before breakfast?"

The question was put casually, but I noted a slight quiver of surprise in the butler's thin drooping eyelids.

"No, sir."

"Even though you saw no one," pursued Vance, "would it not have been possible for some member of the household to have gone out and returned without your knowing it?"

PYNE for the first time during the interview appeared reluctant to answer.

"Well, sir, the fact is," he said uneasily, "anyone might have used the front door this morning without my knowing it, as I was in the dining-room setting table. And, for the matter of that, anyone might have used the archery-room door, for my daughter generally keeps the kitchen door closed while preparing breakfast."

Vance smoked thoughtfully a moment. Then in an even, matter-of-fact tone he asked: "Does anyone in the house own a revolver?"

The man's eyes opened wide.

"Not that I—know of, sir," he answered haltingly.

"Ever hear of the Bishop, Pyne?"

"Oh, no, sir!" His face blanched. "You mean the man who wrote those letters to the papers?"

"I merely meant the Bishop," said Vance carelessly. "But tell me: have you heard anything about a man being killed in Riverside Park this morning?"

"Yes, sir. The janitor next door was telling me about it."

"You knew young Mr. Sprigg, didn't you?"

"I'd seen him at the house here once or twice, sir."

"Was he here recently?"

"Last week, sir. Thursday I think it was."

"Who else was here at the time?"

Pyne frowned as if trying to remember.

"Mr. Drukker, sir," he said after a moment. "And, as I recall, Mr. Pardee came too. They were together in Mr. Arnesson's room talking until late."

"In Mr. Arnesson's room, eh? Is it custom'ry for Mr. Arnesson to receive callers in his room?"

"No, sir," Pyne explained; "but the professor was working in the library, and Miss Dillard was with Mrs. Drukker in the drawing-room here."

Vance was silent a while.

"That will be all, Pyne," he said at length. "But please send Beedle to us at once."

BEEDLE came and stood before us with sullen aggressiveness. Vance questioned her along the same lines he had taken with Pyne. Her answers, for the most part monosyllabic, added nothing to what had already been learned. But at the end of the brief interview Vance asked her if she had happened to look out of the kitchen window that morning before breakfast.

"I looked out once or twice," she answered defiantly. "Why shouldn't I look out?"

"Did you see anyone on the archery range or in the rear yard?"

"No one but the professor and Mrs. Drukker."

"No strangers?" Vance strove to give the impression that the fact of Professor Dillard's and Mrs. Drukker's presence in the rear yard that morning was of no importance; but, by the slow, deliberate way in which he reached into his pocket for his cigarette case, I knew the information had interested him keenly.

"No," the woman replied curtly.

"What time did you notice the professor and Mrs. Drukker?"

"Eight o'clock maybe."

"Were they talking together?"

"Yes. Anyway," she amended, "they were walking up and down near the arbor."

"Is it custom'ry for them to stroll in the yard before breakfast?"

"Mrs. Drukker often comes out early and walks about the flower beds. And I guess the professor has a right to walk in his own yard any time he wants to."

"I'm not questioning his rights in the matter, Beedle," said Vance mildly. "I was merely wondering if he was in the habit of exercising those rights at such an early hour."

"Well, he was exercising 'em this morning."

Vance dismissed the woman and, rising, went to the front window. He was patently puzzled, and stood several minutes looking down the street toward the river.

"WELL, well," he murmured. "It's a nice day for communin' with nature. At eight this morning the lark was on the wing no doubt, and—who knows?—maybe there was a snail on the thorn. But—my word!—all wasn't right with the world."

Markham recognized the signs of Vance's perplexity.

"What do you make of it?" he asked. "I'm inclined to ignore Beedle's information."

"The trouble is, Markham, we can't afford to ignore anything in this case." Vance spoke softly, without turning. "I'll admit, though, that at present Beedle's revelation is meaningless. We've merely learned that two of the actors in our melodrama were up and about this morning shortly after Sprigg was snuffed out. The al fresco rendezvous between the professor and Mrs. Drukker may, of course, be just one of your beloved coincidences. On the other hand, it may have

Wait For Proof

Make us show you before you buy. This 10-day test proves what we claim. 85% of men never return to former shaving methods after making it.

Gentlemen: When a salesman calls on us, we hear his story impartially, then ask him to leave us samples. This before we buy the product he offers us.

We ask from you the same courtesy you would give anyone with an article calculated to please you. That comes to you fairly and honestly and asks a chance to prove its merit.

We do not ask you to buy until you are convinced. Instead we offer to take the responsibility of pleasing you. When you "OK" our product is time enough to try to sell it to you.

The foundation of a spectacular success

For years men wanted a certain type of shaving cream. Some preparations embodied one feature, others another. No one cream contained them all.

We asked 1000 men to tell us what these things were. Then set out to achieve them.

Our laboratories, as you know, make the popular Palmolive Soap of schoolgirl complexion fame. Our 60 years of soap-making have brought leaders to many fields of cleansers.

Formula after formula failed—129 in all. Then came success, and a shaving cream that men tell us is truly remarkable. Now we ask you to give us your opinion after you have first made our free test.

5 amazing features

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

some bearing on the old gentleman's sentimental attitude toward the lady. . . . I think we'll have to make a few discreet inquiries of him about his ante-prandial tryst, what? . . ."

HE LEANED suddenly toward the window.

"Ah! Here comes Arnesson. Looks a bit excited."

A few moments later there was the sound of a key in the front door, and Arnesson strode down the hall. When he saw us he came quickly into the drawing-room and, without a word of greeting, burst forth:

"What's this I hear about Sprigg being shot?" His eager eyes darted from one to the other of us. "I suppose you're here to ask me about him. Well, fire away." He threw a bulky brief-case on the center-table and sat down abruptly on the edge of a straight chair. "There was a detective up at college this morning asking fool questions and acting like a burlesque sleuth in a comic opera. Very mysterious. . . . Murder—horrible murder! What did we know about a certain John E. Sprigg? And so on. . . . Scared a couple of juniors out of an entire semester's mental growth, and sent a harmless young English instructor into incipient nervous collapse. I didn't see the Dogberry myself—was in class at the time. But he had the cheek to ask what women Sprigg went around with. Sprigg and women! That boy didn't have a thought in his head but his work. Brightest man in senior math. Never missed a class. When he didn't answer roll call this morning I knew something serious was the matter. At the lunch hour everyone was buzzing about the murder. . . . What's the answer?"

"We haven't the answer, Mr. Arnesson." Vance had been watching him closely. "However, we have another determinant for your formula. Johnny Sprigg was shot this morning with a little gun through the middle of his wig."

ARNESSON stared at Vance for some time without moving. Then he threw his head back and gave a sardonic laugh.

"Some more mumbo-jumbo, eh?—like the death of Cock Robin. . . . Read me the rune."

Vance gave him briefly the details of the crime.

"That's all we know at present," he concluded. "Could you, Mr. Arnesson, add any suggestive details?"

"Good Lord, no!" The man appeared genuinely amazed. "Not a thing. Sprigg . . . one of the keenest students I ever had. Something of a genius, by Gad! Too bad his parents named him John—plenty of other names. It sealed his doom apparently: got him shot through the head by a maniac. Obviously the same merry-andrew who did Robin in with an arrow." He rubbed his hands together—the abstract philosopher in him had become uppermost. "A nice problem. You've told me everything? I'll need every known integer. Maybe I'll hit upon a new mathematical method in the process—like Kepler." He chuckled over the conceit. "Remember Kepler's 'Doliometrie'? It became the foundation of Infinitesimal Calculus. He arrived at it trying to construct a cask for his wine—a cask with a minimum amount of wood and a maximum cubical content. Maybe the formulas I work out to solve these crimes will open up new fields of scientific research. Ha! Robin and Sprigg will then become martyrs."

The man's humor, even taking into consideration his life's passion for abstractions, struck me as particularly distasteful. But Vance seemed not to mind his cold-blooded cynicism.

"There's one item," he said, "that I omitted to mention." Turning to Markham he asked for the piece of paper containing the formula, and handed it to Arnesson. "This was found beneath Sprigg's body."

The other scrutinized it superciliously.

"The Bishop, I see, is again involved. Same paper and typing as the notes. . . . But where did he get that Riemann-Christoffel tensor? Now, if it had been some other tensor—like the G-sigma-tau, for instance—anyone interested in practical physics might have hit on it. But this one isn't common; and the statement of it here is arbitrary and unusual. Certain terms omitted. . . . By George! I was talking to Sprigg about this only the other night. He wrote it down, too."

"Pyne mentioned the fact that Sprigg had called here Thursday night," put in Vance.

"Oh, he did, did he? . . . Thursday—that's right. Pardee was here, too. And Drukker. We had a discussion on Gaussian coördinates. This tensor came up—Drukker mentioned it first, I think. And Pardee had some mad notion of applying the higher mathematics to chess. . . ."

"Do you play chess, by the by?" asked Vance.

"Used to. But no more. A beautiful game, though—if it wasn't for the players. Queer crabs, chess players."

"Did you ever make any study of the Pardee gambit?" (At the time I could not understand the seeming irrelevance of Vance's questions; and I noticed that Markham too was beginning to show signs of impatience.)

"Poor old Pardee!" Arnesson smiled unfeelingly. "Not a bad elementary mathematician. Should have been a high-school teacher. Too much money, though. Took to chess. I told him his gambit was unscientific. Even showed him how it could be beaten. But he couldn't see it. Then Capablanca, Vidmar, and Tartakower came along and knocked it into a cocked hat. Just as I told him they would. Wrecked his life. He's been fussing around with another gambit for years, but can't make it cohere. Reads Weyl, Silberstein, Eddington and Mach in the hope of getting inspiration."

"THAT'S most interestin'." Vance extended his match case to Arnesson, who had been filling his pipe as he talked. "Was Pardee well acquainted with Sprigg?"

"Oh, no. Met him here twice—that's all. Pardee knows Drukker well, though. Always asking him about potentials and scalars and vectors. Hopes to hit on something that'll revolutionize chess."

"Was he interested in the Riemann-Christoffel tensor when you discussed it the other night?"

"Can't say that he was. A bit out of his realm. You can't hitch the curvature of space-time to a chess-board."

"What do you make of this formula being found on Sprigg?"

"Don't make anything of it. If it had been in Sprigg's handwriting I'd say it dropped out of his pocket. But who'd go to the trouble of typing a mathematical formula?"

"The Bishop apparently."

Arnesson took his pipe from his mouth and grinned.

"Bishop X. We'll have to find him. He's full of whimsies. Perverted sense of values."

"Obviously." Vance spoke languidly. "And, by the by, I almost forgot to ask you: does the Dillard house harbor any revolvers?"

"Oho!" Arnesson chuckled with unrestrained delight. "Sits the wind there? . . . Sorry to disappoint you. No revolvers. No sliding doors. No secret stairways. All open and above-board."

Vance sighed theatrically.

"Sad . . . sad. And I had such a comfortin' theory."

Belle Dillard had come silently down the hall, and now stood in the archway. She had evidently heard Vance's question and Arnesson's answer.

"But there are two revolvers in the house, Sigurd," she declared. "Don't you remember the old revolvers I used for target practice in the country?"

"Thought you'd thrown 'em away long ago." Arnesson rose and drew up a chair for her. "I told you when we returned from Hopatcong that summer that only burglars and bandits are allowed to own guns in this benevolent state. . . ."

"But I didn't believe you," the girl protested. "I never know when you're jesting and when you're serious."

"AND you kept them, Miss Dillard?" came Vance's quiet voice.

"Why—yes." She shot an apprehensive glance at Heath. "Shouldn't I have done so?"

"I believe it was technically illegal. However"—Vance smiled reassuringly—"I don't think the Sergeant will invoke the Sullivan law against you. Where are they now?"

"Down-stairs—in the archery-room. They're in one of the drawers of the tool chest."

Vance rose.

"Would you be so good, Miss Dillard, as to show us where you put them? I have a gnawin' curiosity to see 'em, don't y' know."

The girl hesitated and looked to Arnesson for guidance. When he nodded she turned without a word and led the way to the archery-room.

"They're in that chest by the window," she said.

Going to it she drew out a small deep drawer in one end. At the rear, beneath a mass of odds and ends, was a .38 Colt automatic.

"Why!" she exclaimed. "There's only one here. The other is gone."

"It was a smaller pistol, wasn't it?" asked Vance.

"Yes. . . ."

"A .32?"

The girl nodded and turned bewildered eyes on Arnesson.

"Well, it's gone, Belle," he told her, with a shrug. "Can't be helped. Probably one of your young archers took it to blow out his brains with after he'd foozled at shooting arrows up the alley."

"Do be serious, Sigurd," she pleaded, a little frightened. "Where could it have gone?"

"Ha! Another dark mystery," scoffed Arnesson. "Strange disappearance of a discarded .32."

Seeing the girl's uneasiness Vance changed the subject.

"Perhaps, Miss Dillard, you'd be good enough to take us to Mrs. Drukker. There are one or two matters we want to speak to her about; and I assume, by your presence here, that the drive in the country has been postponed."

A SHADOW of distress passed over the girl's face.

"Oh, you mustn't bother her today." Her tone was tragically appealing. "Lady Mae is very ill. I can't understand it—she seemed so well when I was talking with her up-stairs. But after she'd seen you and Mr. Markham she changed: she became weak and . . . oh, something terrible seemed to be preying on her mind. After I'd put her to bed she kept repeating in an awful whisper: 'Johnny Sprig, Johnny Sprig.' . . . I 'phoned her doctor and he came right over. He said she had to be kept very quiet. . . ."

"It's of no importance," Vance assured her. "Of course we shall wait. Who is her doctor, Miss Dillard?"

"Whitney Barstead. He's attended her as long as I can remember."

"A good man," nodded Vance. "There's no better neurologist in the country. We'll do nothing without his permission."

Miss Dillard gave him a grateful look. Then she excused herself.

When we were again in the drawing-room Arnesson stationed himself before the fireplace and regarded Vance satirically.

"'Johnny Sprig, Johnny Sprig.' Ha! Lady Mae got the idea at once. She may be cracked, but certain lobes of her brain are over-active. Unaccountable piece of machinery, the human brain. Some of the greatest mental computers of Europe are morons. And I know a couple of chess masters who need nurses to dress and feed 'em."

Vance appeared not to hear him. He had stopped by a small cabinet near the archway and was apparently absorbed in a set of ivory carvings of ancient Chinese origin.

"That elephant doesn't belong there," he remarked casually, pointing to a tiny figure in the collection. "It's bunjinga—decadent, don't y' know. Clever, but not authentic. Probably a copy of a Manchu piece." He stifled a yawn and turned toward Markham. "I say, old man, there's nothing more we can do. Suppose we toddle. We might have a brief word with the professor before we go, though. . . . Mind waiting for us here, Mr. Arnesson?"

Arnesson lifted his eyebrows in some surprise, but immediately crinkled his face into a disdainful smile.

"Oh, no. Go ahead."

Professor Dillard was much annoyed at our second intrusion.

"We've just learned," said Markham, "that you were speaking to Mrs. Drukker before breakfast this morning. . . ."

The muscles of Professor Dillard's cheeks worked angrily.

"Is it any concern of the District Attorney's office if I speak to a neighbor in my garden?"

"Certainly not, sir. But I am in the midst of an investigation which seriously concerns your house, and I assumed that I had the privilege of seeking help from you."

The old man spluttered a moment.

"Very well," he acquiesced irritably. "I saw no one except Mrs. Drukker—if that's what you're after."

Vance projected himself into the conversation.

"That's not what we came to you for, Professor Dillard. We wanted merely to ask you if Mrs. Drukker gave you the impression this morning that she suspected what had taken place earlier in Riverside Park."

The professor was about to make a sharp retort, but checked himself. After a moment he said simply:

"No, she gave me no such impression."

"Did she appear in any way uneasy or, let us say, excited?"

"She did not!" Professor Dillard rose and faced Markham. "I understand perfectly what you are driving at; and I won't have it. I've told you, Markham, that I'll take no part in spying or tale-bearing where this unhappy woman is concerned. That's all I have to say to you." He turned back to his desk. "I regret I'm very busy today."

WE DESCENDED to the main floor and made our adieus to Arnesson. He waved his hand to us cordially as we went out; but his smile held something of contemptuous patronage, as if he had witnessed, and was gloating over, the rebuff we had just received.

When we were on the sidewalk Vance paused to light a fresh cigarette.

"Now for a brief causerie with the sad and gentlemanly Mr. Pardee. I don't know what he can tell us, but I have a yearnin' to commune with him."

Pardee, however, was not at home.

"Tomorrow will be time enough," Vance said to Markham, as we turned away from the house. "I'll get in touch with Doctor Barstead in the morning and try to arrange to see Mrs. Drukker. We'll include Pardee in the same pilgrimage."

"I sure hope," grumbled Heath, "that we learn more tomorrow than we did today."

"You overlook one or two consolin' windfalls, Sergeant," returned Vance. "We've found out that everyone connected with the Dillard house was acquainted with Sprigg and could easily have known of his early morning walks along the Hudson. We've also learned that the professor and Mrs. Drukker were ramblin' in the garden at eight o'clock this morning. And we discovered that a .32 revolver has disappeared from the archery-room.— Not an embarrassment of riches, but something—oh, decidedly something."

As we drove down-town Markham roused himself from gloomy abstraction, and looked apprehensively at Vance.

"I'm almost afraid to go on with this case. It's becoming too sinister. And if the newspapers get hold of that Johnny-Sprig nursery rhyme and connect the two murders, I hate to think of the gaudy sensation that'll follow."

"I fear you're in for it, old man," sighed Vance. "I'm not a bit psychic—never had dreams that came true, and don't know what a telepathic seizure feels like—but something tells me that the Bishop is going to acquaint the press with that bit of Mother-Goose verse. The point of his new joke is even obscurer than his Cock-Robin comedy. He'll see to it that no one misses it. Even a grim humorist who uses corpses for his cap-and-bells must have his audience. Therein lies the one weakness of his abominable crimes. It's about our only hope, Markham."

"I'll give Quinan a ring," said Heath, "and find out if anything has been received."

But the Sergeant was saved the trouble. The "World" reporter was waiting for us at the District Attorney's office, and Swacker ushered him in at once.

"Howdy, Mr. Markham." There was a breezy impudence in Quinan's manner, but withal he showed signs of nervous excitement. "I've got something here for Sergeant Heath. They told me at Headquarters that he was handling the Sprigg case, and said he was parleying with you. So I blew over." He reached in his pocket and, taking out a sheet of paper, handed it to Heath. "I'm being mighty high, wide, and handsome with you, Sergeant, and I expect a little inside stuff by way of reciprocity. . . . Cast your eye on that document. Just received by America's foremost family journal."

It was a plain piece of typewriting paper, and it contained the Mother-Goose melody of Johnny Sprig, typed in élite characters with a pale blue ribbon. In the lower right-hand corner was the signature in capitals: THE BISHOP.

"And here's the envelope, Sergeant." Quinan again dug down into his pocket.

The official cancellation bore the hour of 9 A. M., and, like the first note, it had been mailed in the district of Post Office Station "N."

A MIDNIGHT CALL

(Tuesday, April 12th; 10 a. m.)

THE following morning the front pages of the metropolitan press carried sensational stories which surpassed Markham's worst fears. In addition to the "World" two other leading morning journals had received notes similar to the one shown us by Quinan; and the excitement created by their publication was tremendous. The entire city was thrown into a state of apprehension and fear; and though half-hearted attempts were made here and there to dismiss the maniacal aspects of the crimes on the ground of coincidence, and to explain away the Bishop notes as the work of a practical joker, all the newspapers and the great majority of the public were thoroughly convinced that a new and terrible type of killer was preying upon the community.*

Markham and Heath were beset by reporters, but a veil of secrecy was sedu-

A similar state of panic obtained in London in 1888 when Jack-the-Ripper was engaged in his grisly, abnormal debauch; and again in Hanover in 1923 when Haarmann, the werwolf, was busy with his anthropophagous slaughters. But I can recall no other modern parallel for the atmosphere of gruesome horror that settled over New York during the Bishop murders.

CHRYSLER PLYMOUTH

Changing the Buying Habits of a Nation

More and more the millions who count the cost of motoring realize how clearly the new Plymouth overshadows in actual dollar value the few other cars in the lowest-priced field.

No longer is their question, "How low?" Instead, they ask, "How much do I get in size, style, performance and quality for my dollar?"

The answer is simplicity itself. Keeping in mind these other lowest-priced cars, they find the Plymouth presents vivid contrasts in adult-sized bodies, in beauty and luxury which bespeak its greater value at a glance.

They are instantly won by its new and distinctive design—slender-profile chromium-plated radiator, arched-window silhouette and "air-wing" fenders.

Road performance tells an even more convincing story — generous power, speed, and startling smoothness from the new "Silver-Dome" high-compression engine, using any gasoline. And the safety of internal-expanding hydraulic 4-wheel brakes, positive in all weather.

See it! Examine it critically. You will at once know why the Plymouth, by proving through comparison its greater dollar value, is upsetting buying habits of many years' standing in the lowest-priced group.

lously maintained. No intimation was given that there was any reason to believe that the solution lay close to the Dillard household; and no mention was made of the missing .32 revolver. Sperling's status was sympathetically dealt with by the press. After the Sprigg murder the general attitude was that he had been the unfortunate victim of circumstances; and all criticism of Markham's procrastination in prosecuting him was instantly dropped.

On the day that Sprigg was shot Markham called a conference at the Stuyvesant Club. Both Inspector Moran of the Detective Bureau and Chief Inspector O'Brien* attended. The two murders were gone over in detail, and Vance outlined his reasons for believing that the answer to the problem would eventually be found either in the Dillard house or in some quarter directly connected with it.

"We are now in touch," he ended, "with every person who could possibly have had sufficient knowledge of the conditions surrounding the two victims to perpetrate the crimes successfully; and our only course is to concentrate on these persons."

Inspector Moran was inclined to agree. "Except," he qualified, "that none of the dramatis personæ you have mentioned strikes me as a bloodthirsty maniac."

"THE murderer is not a maniac in the conventional sense," returned Vance. "He's probably normal on all other points. His brain, in fact, may be brilliant except for this one lesion—too brilliant, I should say. He has lost all sense of proportion through sheer exalted speculation."

"But does even a perverted superman indulge in such hideous jests without a motive?" asked the Inspector.

"Ah, but there is a motive. Some tremendous impetus is back of the monstrous conception of these murders—an impetus which, in its operative results, takes the form of satanic humor."

It was finally decided that the Bishop notes were to be turned over to an expert analyst, and an effort made to trace both the typewriter and the stationery. A systematic search was to be instituted for witnesses who might have seen someone in Riverside Park between seven and eight that morning. Sprigg's habits and associations were to be made the subject of a careful report; and a man was to be detailed to question the mail collector of the district in the hope that, when taking the letters from the various boxes, he had noticed the envelopes addressed to the papers and could say in which box they had actually been posted.

Various other purely routine activities were outlined; and Moran suggested that for a time three men be stationed day and night in the vicinity of the murders to watch for any possible developments or for suspicious actions on the part of those involved. The Police Department and the District Attorney's office were to work hand in hand. Markham, of course, in tacit agreement with Heath, assumed command.

"I have already interviewed the members of the Dillard and Drukker homes in connection with the Robin murder," Markham explained to Moran and O'Brien; "and I've talked the Sprigg case over with Professor Dillard and Arnesson. Tomorrow I shall see Pardee and the Drukkers."

The next morning Markham, accompanied by Heath, called for Vance a little before ten o'clock.

"This thing can't go on," he declared, after the meagerest of greetings. "If anyone knows anything we've got to find it out. I'm going to put the screws on—and damn the consequences!"

"By all means, chivy 'em." Vance himself appeared despondent. "I doubt if it'll help though. No ordin'ry procedure is going to solve this riddle. However, I've phoned Barstead. He says we may talk with Mrs. Drukker this morning. But I've arranged to see him first. I have a hankerin' to know more of the Drukker pathology. Hunchbacks, d' ye see, are not usually produced by falls."

We drove at once to the doctor's home and were received without delay. Doctor Barstead was a large comfortable man, whose pleasantness of manner impressed me as being the result of schooled effort.

Vance went straight to the point.

"We have reason to believe, Doctor, that Mrs. Drukker and perhaps her son are indirectly concerned in the recent death of Mr. Robin at the Dillard house; and before we question either of them further we should like to have you tell us—as far as professional etiquette will permit—something of the neurological situation we are facing."

"Please be more explicit, sir." Doctor Barstead spoke with defensive aloofness.

"I am told," Vance continued, "that Mrs. Drukker regards herself as responsible for her son's kyphosis; but it is my understanding that such malformations as his do not ordinarily result from mere physical injuries."

Doctor Barstead nodded his head slowly.

"That is quite true. Compression paraplegia of the spinal cord may follow a dislocation or injury, but the lesion thus produced is of the focal transverse type. Osteitis or caries of the vertebræ—what we commonly call Pott's disease—is usually of tubercular origin; and this tuberculosis of the spine occurs most frequently in children. Often it exists at birth. True, an injury may precede the onset by determining the site of infection or exciting a latent focus; and this fact no doubt gives rise to the belief that the injury itself produces the disease. But both Schmaus and Horsley have exposed the true pathological anatomy of spinal caries. Drukker's deformity is unquestionably of tubercular origin. Even his curvature is of the marked rounded type, denoting an extensive involvment of vertebræ; and there is no scoliosis whatever. Moreover, he has all the local symptoms of osteitis.

"YOU have, of course, explained the situation to Mrs. Drukker."

"On many occasions. But I have had no success. The fact is, a terrific instinct of perverted martyrdom bids her cling to the notion that she is responsible for her son's condition. This erroneous idea has become an idée fixe with her. It constitutes her entire mental outlook, and gives meaning to the life of service and sacrifice she has lived for forty years."

"To what extent," asked Vance, "would you say this psychoneurosis has affected her mind?"

"That would be difficult to say; and it is not a question I would care to discuss. I may say this, however: she is undoubtedly morbid; and her values have become distorted. At times there have been—I tell you this in strictest confidence—signs of marked hallucinosis centering upon her son. His welfare has become an obsession with her. There is practically nothing she would not do for him."

"We appreciate your confidence, Doctor. . . . And would it not be logical to assume that her upset condition yesterday resulted from some fear or shock connected with his welfare?"

"Undoubtedly. She has no emotional or mental life outside of him. But whether her temporary collapse was due to a real or imaginary fear, one cannot say. She has lived too long on the borderland between reality and fantasy."

THERE was a short silence, and then Vance asked:

"As to Drukker himself: would you regard him as wholly responsible for his acts?"

"Since he is my patient," returned Doctor Barstead, with frigid reproach, "and since I have taken no steps to sequester him, I consider your question an impertinence."

Markham leaned over and spoke peremptorily.

"We haven't time to mince words, Doctor. We're investigating a series of atrocious murders. Mr. Drukker is involved in those murders—to what extent we don't know. But it is our duty to find out."

The doctor's first impulse was to combat Markham; but he evidently thought better of it, for when he answered, it was in an indulgently matter-of-fact voice.

"I have no reason, sir, to withhold any information from you. But to question Mr. Drukker's responsibility is to impute negligence to me in the matter of public safety. Perhaps, however, I misunderstand this gentleman's question." He studied Vance for a brief moment. "There are, of course, degrees of responsibility," he went on, in a professional tone. "Mr. Drukker's mind is overdeveloped, as is often the case with kyphotic victims. All mental processes are turned inward, as it were; and the lack of normal physical reactions often tends to produce inhibitions and aberrancies. But I've noted no indications of this condition in Mr. Drukker. He is excitable and prone to hysteria; but, then, psychokinesia is a common accompaniment of his disease."

"What form do his recreations take?" Vance was politely casual.

"Children's games, I should say. Such recreations are not unusual with cripples. In Mr. Drukker's case it is what we might term a waking wish-fulfilment. Having had no normal childhood, he grasps at whatever will give him a sense of youthful rehabilitation. His juvenile activities tend to balance the monotony of his purely mental life."

"What is Mrs. Drukker's attitude toward his instinct for play?"

"She very correctly encourages it. I've often seen her leaning over the wall above the playground in Riverside Park watching him. And she always presides at the children's parties and dinners which he holds in his home."

We took our leave a few minutes later.

*Chief Inspector O'Brien was then in command of the entire Police Department.

IT'S FUR coat weather in Alaska much of the year so Alaskan motorists ward off dilution troubles with Mobiloil Arctic.
—Keystone View Co.

THE PRESIDENT of Finland can't be kept waiting on an icy Finland morning so his chauffeurs always depend on Mobiloil for quick starting.

ALASKA, Iceland and Greenland were crossed by the U. S. Army fliers who circled the globe with Mobiloil.

NO DILUTION troubles for the motorists in Greenland.

MOBILOIL is a favorite in Denmark: The King visits a Mobiloil exhibit at Copenhagen.

Do "winter oils" increase wear?

Yes—in the case of many too-light oils which are made primarily to give easy starting.

No—if your winter oil is the free-flowing but rich-bodied Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic. (See special chart on this page.)

Of course you want to start your engine in cold weather without prolonged use of the choke. But not at the risk of losing the lubricating protection which is vitally needed in winter.

Too-thin an oil fails to seal your pistons. Unburned gasoline may wash these watery oils off the cylinder walls. Down goes the gasoline into the crankcase. Sometimes you may have a quart of gasoline mixed with your oil supply after only 500 miles of driving.

Then moving surfaces of your engine may suffer direct metal-to-metal friction and serious wear.

Winter risks are minimized when you use Mobiloil Arctic. Mobiloil Arctic gives easy starting and thorough lubricating protection. It retains its richness. It resists the washing-away effect of the raw gasoline.

When you use Mobiloil Arctic you rely on a specialized winter oil with the greatest record of cold-weather lubricating success—not only in the United States, but in Norway, Sweden, Finland, Poland and other cold-winter countries the world over.

For easy starting and real protection against serious gasoline dilution in winter, you can always count on Mobiloil Arctic.

As we turned into Seventy-sixth Street, Heath, as if arousing himself from a bad dream, drew a deep breath and sat upright in the car.

"Did you get that about the kid games?" he asked, in an awe-stricken voice. "Good God, Mr. Vance! What's this case going to turn into?"

Our ring at the Drukker house was answered by a portly German woman, who planted herself stolidly before us and informed us suspiciously that Mr. Drukker was too busy to see anyone.

"You'd better tell him, however," said Vance, "that the District Attorney wishes to speak to him immediately."

His words produced a strange effect on the woman. Her hands went to her face, and her massive bosom rose and fell convulsively. Then, as though panic-stricken, she turned and ascended the stairs. We heard her knock on a door: there was a sound of voices; and a few moments later she came back to inform us that Mr. Drukker would see us in his study.

As we passed the woman Vance suddenly turned and, fixing his eyes on her ominously, asked:

"What time did Mr. Drukker get up yesterday morning?"

"I—I don't know," she stammered, thoroughly frightened. "Ja, ja, I know. At nine o'clock—like always."

Vance nodded and moved on.

DRUKKER received us standing by a large table covered with books and sheets of manuscript. He bowed somberly, but did not ask us to have chairs.

Vance studied him a moment as if trying to read the secret that lay behind his restless hollow eyes.

"Mr. Drukker," he began, "it is not our desire to cause you unnecess'ry trouble; but we have learned that you were acquainted with Mr. John Sprigg, who, as you probably know, was shot near here yesterday morning. Now, could you suggest any reason that anyone might have had for killing him?"

Drukker drew himself up. Despite his effort at self-control there was a slight tremor in his voice as he answered:

"I knew Mr. Sprigg but slightly. I can suggest nothing whatever in regard to his death. . . ."

"There was found on his body a piece of paper bearing the Riemann-Christoffel tensor which you introduce in your book in the chapter on the finiteness of physical space." As Vance spoke he moved one of the typewritten sheets of papers on the table toward him, and glanced at it casually.

Drukker seemed not to notice the action. The information contained in Vance's words had riveted his attention.

"I can't understand it," he said vaguely. "May I see the notation?"

Markham complied at once with his request. After studying the paper a moment Drukker handed it back; and his little eyes narrowed malevolently.

"Have you asked Arnesson about this? He was discussing this very subject with Sprigg last week."

"Oh, yes," Vance told him carelessly. "Mr. Arnesson recalled the incident, but couldn't throw any light on it. We thought perhaps you could succeed where he had failed."

"I regret I can't accommodate you." There was the suggestion of a sneer in Drukker's reply. "Anyone might use the tensor. Weyl's and Einstein's works are full of it. It isn't copyrighted. . . ." He leaned over a revolving bookcase and drew out a thick quarto volume. "Here it is in Minkowski's 'Relativitätsprinzip,' only with different symbols—a T for the B, for instance; and Greek letters for the indices." He reached for another volume. "Poincaré also uses it in his 'Hypothèses Cosmogoniques,' with still other symbolic equivalents." He tossed the books on the table contemptuously. "Why come to me about it?"

"IT WASN'T the tensor formula alone that led our roving footsteps to your door," said Vance lightly. "For instance, we have reason to believe that Sprigg's death is connected with Robin's murder. . . ."

Drukker's long hands caught the edge of the table, and he leaned forward, his eyes glittering excitedly.

"Connected—Sprigg and Robin? You don't believe that newspaper talk, do you? . . . It's a lie!" His face had begun to twitch, and his voice rose shrilly. "It's insane nonsense. . . . There's no proof, I tell you—not a shred of proof!"

"Cock Robin and Johnny Sprig, don't y' know," came Vance's soft insistent voice.

"That rot! That crazy rot!—Oh, good God! Has the world gone mad! . . ." He swayed back and forth, as he beat on the table with one hand, sending the papers flying in all directions.

Vance looked at him with mild surprise.

"Aren't you acquainted with the Bishop, Mr. Drukker?"

The man stopped swaying and, steadying himself, stared at Vance with terrible intensity.

"You, too! You've gone mad!" He swept his eyes over us. "You unutterable fools! There's no such person as the Bishop! There wasn't any such person as Cock Robin or Johnny Sprig. And here you are—men grown—trying to frighten me—me, a mathematician—with nursery tales! . . ." He began to laugh hysterically.

Vance went to him quickly, and taking his arm led him to his chair. Slowly his laughter died away, and he waved his hand wearily.

"Too bad Robin and Sprigg were killed." His tone was heavy and colorless. "But children are the only persons that matter. . . . You'll probably find the murderer. If you don't, maybe I'll help you. But don't let your imaginations run away with you. Keep to facts . . . facts. . . ."

The man was exhausted, and we left him.

"He's scared, Markham—deuced scared," observed Vance, when we were again in the hall. "I could bear to know what is hidden in that shrewd warped mind of his."

He led the way down the hall to Mrs. Drukker's door.

"This method of visiting a lady doesn't accord with the best social usage. Really, y' know, Markham, I wasn't born to be a policeman. I abhor snooping."

Our knock was answered by a feeble voice. Mrs. Drukker, paler than usual, was lying back on her chaise-longue by the window. Her white prehensile hands lay along the arms of the chair, slightly flexed; and more than ever she recalled to my mind the pictures I had seen of the ravening Harpies that tormented Phineus in the story of the Argonauts.

Before we could speak she said in a strained terrified voice: "I knew you would come—I knew you were not through torturing me. . . ."

"To torture you, Mrs. Drukker," returned Vance softly, "is the farthest thing from our thoughts. We merely want your help."

Vance's manner appeared to alleviate her terror somewhat, and she studied him calculatingly.

"If only I could help you!" she muttered. "But there's nothing to be done—nothing. . . ."

"You might tell us what you saw from your window on the day of Mr. Robin's death," Vance suggested kindly.

"No—no!" Her eyes stared horribly. "I saw nothing—I wasn't near the window that morning. You may kill me, but my dying words would be 'No—no—no!'"

Vance did not press the point.

"Beedle tells me," he went on, "that you often rise early and walk in the garden."

"Oh, yes." The words came with a sigh of relief. "I don't sleep well in the mornings. I often wake up with dull boring pains in my spine, and the muscles of my back feel rigid and sore. So I get up and walk in the yard whenever the weather is mild enough."

"Beedle saw you in the garden yesterday morning."

The woman nodded absently.

"And she also saw Professor Dillard with you."

Again she nodded, but immediately afterward she shot Vance a combative inquisitive glance.

"He sometimes joins me," she hastened to explain. "He feels sorry for me, and he admires Adolph; he thinks he's a great genius. And he is a genius! He'd be a great man—as great as Professor Dillard—if it hadn't been for his illness. . . . And it was all my fault. I let him fall when he was a baby. . . ." A dry sob shook her emaciated body, and her fingers worked spasmodically.

AFTER a moment Vance asked: "What did you and Professor Dillard talk about in the garden yesterday?"

A sudden wiliness crept into the woman's manner.

"About Adolph mostly," she said, with a too obvious attempt at unconcern.

"Did you see anyone else in the yard or on the archery range?"

"No!" Again a sense of fear pervaded her. "But somebody else was there, wasn't there?—somebody who didn't wish to be seen." She nodded her head eagerly. "Yes! Someone else was there—and they thought I saw them. . . . But I didn't! Oh, merciful Heaven, I didn't! . . ." She covered her face with her hands, and her body shook convulsively. "If only I had seen them! If only I knew! But it wasn't Adolph—it wasn't my little boy. He was asleep—thank God, he was asleep!"

Vance went close to the woman.

"Why do you thank God that it wasn't your son?" he asked gently.

She looked up with some amazement.

"Why, don't you remember? A little man shot Johnny Sprigg with a little gun yesterday morning—the same little man

The Happy Day

"You surely deserve release from work and care. We owe our success to you and other men who always gave us the best they had. Pay days will be provided for you, as long as you live, out of the Cooperative Retirement Fund which you helped to build. You have earned the right to take it easy. Good luck!"

©1928 M. L. I. CO.

AFTER the man who has won the right to retire in ease and comfort has been congratulated, the wise president and board of directors who thus show their appreciation of faithful service also deserve congratulations. Such appreciation inspires new courage in all hearts. The interests of capital and labor are inseparably linked. Through cooperative efforts their most difficult problems are being solved.

Many of the biggest employers of labor are themselves employees and do not own the companies they manage. These men have learned that officers as well as men in the ranks do better work if they know that years of loyal service will be amply rewarded.

Stockholders expect dividends. Employees expect good wages. In wise management there is a fair and just division of earnings which must be preserved in a delicate balance. Not all of the yearly earnings may safely be paid out in dividends and pay checks.

Long-headed business men lay aside money for new and more effective equipment when old machines shall be worn out. In the same way they make plans that permit the honorable retirement of veterans and the filling of their places by younger men.

Big business recognizes that it is good business to establish the independence of faithful workers in their later years. By planning together for their mutual advantage, employers and employees can build a sound Retirement Plan based on earnings and savings that will provide a regular, definite income for life.

No man of spirit wants charity but he does want an opportunity to become independent.

Business has welcomed the development of modern pension plans which have made possible retirement with a fixed income. While, in the past, many privately owned businesses have provided quietly for the needs of retired employees, scientific pension systems are a comparatively new development.

Some of the earlier plans, dictated more by good intentions than by sound financing, are so hopelessly involved that they will have to be revised or completely abandoned.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has made a comprehensive study of more than 350 different pension plans in operation today. To employees and employers interested in a sound solution of pension problems, the Metropolitan will be glad to mail without charge, Booklet 128-A, "Sound Retirement Plans and What They Should Provide".

that killed Cock Robin with a bow and arrow. It's all a horrible game—and I'm afraid. . . . But I mustn't tell! I can't tell. The little man might do something awful. Maybe"—her voice became dull with horror—"maybe he has some insane idea that I'm the old woman who lived in a shoe! . . ."

"Come, come, Mrs. Drukker." Vance forced a consoling smile. "Such talk is nonsense. You've let these matters prey on your mind. There's a perfectly rational explanation for everything. And I have a feeling that you yourself can help us find that explanation."

"No—no! I can't—I mustn't! I don't understand it myself."

"Why can't you tell us?" persisted Vance.

"Because I don't know," she cried. I only know that something horrible is going on here—that some awful curse is hanging over this house. . . ."

"How do you know that?"

The woman began to tremble violently, and her eyes roamed distractedly about the room.

"BECAUSE"—her voice was barely audible—"because the little man came here last night!"

A chill passed up my spine at this statement, and I heard even the imperturbable Sergeant's sharp intake of breath. Then Vance's calm voice sounded.

"How do you know he was here, Mrs. Drukker? Did you see him?"

"No, I didn't see him; but he tried to get into this room—by that door." She pointed unsteadily toward the entrance to the hallway.

"You must tell us about it," said Vance: "or we will be driven to conclude that you manufactured the story."

"Oh, but I didn't manufacture it—may God be my witness!" There could be no doubt whatever of the woman's sincerity. Something had occurred which filled her with mortal fear. "I was lying in bed, awake. The little clock on the mantel had just struck midnight; and I heard a soft rustling sound in the hall outside. I turned my head toward the door—there was a dim night light burning on the table here . . . and then I saw the door-knob turn slowly—silently—as if someone were trying to get in without waking me—"

"Just a moment, Mrs. Drukker," interrupted Vance. "Do you always lock your door at night?"

"I've never locked it until recently—after Mr. Robin's death. I've somehow felt insecure since then—I can't explain why. . . ."

"I quite understand.—Please go on with the story. You say you saw the door-knob move. And then?"

"Yes—yes. It moved softly—back and forth. I lay there in bed, frozen with terror. But after a while I managed to call out—I don't know how loud; but suddenly the door-knob ceased to turn, and I heard footsteps moving rapidly away—down the hall. . . . Then I managed to get up. I went to the door and listened. I was afraid—afraid for Adolph. And I could hear those soft footsteps descending the stairs—"

"Which stairs?"

"At the rear—leading to the kitchen. . . . Then the door of the screen porch shut, and everything was silent again. . . . I knelt with my ear to the keyhole a long time, listening, waiting. But nothing happened, and at last I rose. . . . Something seemed to tell me I must open the door. I was in deadly terror—and yet I knew I had to open the door. . . ." A shudder swept her body. "Softly I turned the key, and took hold of the knob. As I pulled the door slowly inward, a tiny object that had been poised on the outside knob fell to the floor with a clatter. There was a light burning in the hall—I always keep one burning at night—and I tried not to look down. I tried—I tried . . . but I couldn't keep my eyes away from the floor. And there at my feet—oh, God in heaven!—there lay something! . . ."

SHE was unable to go on. Horror seemed to paralyze her tongue. Vance's cool, unemotional voice, however, steadied her.

"What was it that lay on the floor, Mrs. Drukker?"

With difficulty the woman rose and, bracing herself for a moment at the foot of the bed, went to the dressing-table. Pulling out a small drawer she reached inside and fumbled among its contents. Then she extended her open hand to us. On the palm lay a small chessman—ebony black against the whiteness of her skin. It was the bishop! (To be continued)

I Wish I Were Somebody Else

"The Importance of Choosing a Career" and "Fix Your Idea on a Definite Goal" as the next boy, but I played my future entirely by eye.

One of my boyhood heroes was James Powers, the comedian at the first musical play I ever saw. After I saw Powers, I decided to become a musical comedy comedian. I practiced his grimaces and the peculiar pitch of his voice for months, and once, when the Church of the Ascension gave an entertainment at the Y. M. C. A. auditorium, I even dressed in a sailor costume and went on to sing a Powers ditty, the chorus of which ran:

Avast, belay, we're off for Baffin's Bay—
We couldn't find the pole because the barber moved away.
The ship got cold; I thought we'd get the grippe,
So the painter put three coats upon the ship—
Hip-Hip Hooray for Baffin's Bay!

"Went on to sing" is right. As soon as I faced the audience, my memory failed me. My début was anything but successful. But even my dismal failure could not immediately make me abandon the notion of being a second Powers.

Of course the Men-I've-Wanted-To-Be were not all home-grown products. There were times when I about made up my mind to start out and follow in the footsteps of such Captains of Industry as the Duke boys, Kellogg, the breakfast food king, Henry Ford, the Armours, the Swifts, the Whelans, the Wrigleys, the Gillettes, and the Smith Brothers.

Not that I'm grasping. I don't always aspire to be somebody with a lot of money. A great performance has its appeal, and I don't believe I have envied anybody in years as much as I envied a certain baseball pitcher who scaled the heights in the Yankee-Cardinal World Series. His name was Grover Cleveland Alexander, and I think it likely that for the rest of my life, whenever I think of ability, skill, and efficiency, I shall think of Alex the Great.

GROVER was considered almost through as a pitcher, so much so that he was cast off by the Chicago club and picked up by the St. Louis. No other team seemed to want him. It was assumed he had seen his best days.

Yet in the most strenuous World Series in years, he pitched three times, giving one of the finest performances in baseball history. He pitched his second winning game on a Saturday in New York, evening up the series and becoming very much of a national hero.

That he had done his bit was conceded. Nobody expected him to appear again in that series. Yet the next day, they had to send for him again. It was the eighth inning. Rogers Hornsby's Cardinals were one run ahead when the Yankees staged an uprising. They got the bases full with two out. Then Tony (Poosh-'em-Up) Lazzeri, one of the youngsters of baseball and something of a home-run swatter, came to the plate. A hit would tie the score and probably win the game, costing the Cards the world's championship.

Hornsby called a halt. He conferred with his lieutenants. Then he gave a signal and all eyes were turned to deep left field, where the Cardinal reserve pitchers were warming up. Presently, a tall, gaunt figure was seen ambling slowly across the field. As he came closer it could be seen that he was a middle-aged gentleman with a very big head and a very small cap. It was "Old Alec," called in once more to save the day.

Everybody by this time was willing to admit that Alexander was a great man, but it was the consensus that Hornsby was stretching things in this attempt to prove Grover was also a great horse.

"What seems to be the trouble?" asked Alec as he reached the box.

"They've got three on and two out," replied Hornsby. "Lazzeri is up and a run will spill the applecart."

"Then we'll have to strike out Mr. Lazzeri," replied Alec. Which he straightway proceeded to do with skill, grace, and dispatch.

There was an idol for you, if accomplishment in a chosen field is what you fancy. Ever since that game, whenever I get to feeling I am doing fairly well with the tasks in hand I think of Alexander the Great. Then I know that I am just loafing.

And the point to bear in mind about Alec is that he never got there by wishing he were somebody else!

What is the real foe of attractive teeth and mouth health?

Uncleanliness!

. . . thousands never have clean teeth because their dentifrices try to "cure" and fail to clean

You use a dentifrice on your toothbrush to clean your teeth more thoroughly and pleasantly than you can with the brush alone. So, clearly, the most important action of a dentifrice is to clean. Colgate's is made to give you the greatest possible safe cleansing power. It would not clean nearly so well if we tried to make it a medicine or treatment as well as a cleanser . . .

Colgate's is made as dentists recommend

Years ago, before Colgate's was brought out, we went to leading dentists and said, "What kind of dentifrice would you like your patients to use? Would you like it medicated, strongly antiseptic, or antacid?" They answered, "Give us a simple, non-medicated dentifrice that really cleans. Give us as much cleansing power as possible without harm to the teeth. If the dentifrice cleans thoroughly, there is nothing else for it to do."

Constant touch with the latest ideas of the dental profession and continuous research only emphasize the importance of a clean mouth. And on the advice of men who know most about mouth care, we continue to make Colgate's the finest dental cleanser that advancing experience can perfect.

The searching, cleansing foam

When you brush with Colgate's you are cleaning your teeth—not doctoring them. The rapidly acting Colgate foam sweeps through your mouth—goes rushing, searching in and out and around teeth and gums—carrying away mucin deposits—polishing enamel glistening smooth—destroying acids that destroy teeth—sweetening all mouth surfaces.

May we send you the free ten-day tube?

A trial of Colgate's quickly shows that cleaning is the important thing in care of the mouth. When your mouth is cleansed the thorough Colgate way, you find medicines and harsh abrasives unnecessary.

We will gladly send with our compliments a tube of Colgate's sufficient for ten days' use. Just return the coupon.

The Strange Result of a Well-Aimed Snowball

begged permission to go along in the buggy when he made sick calls. I would hold the reins while he was inside, and usually he would tell me something about the case.

"We lived a couple of blocks from Mercy Hospital, and that was a source of joy to me too. Whenever an ambulance came in with an accident case, I used to run for the hospital as fast as my legs would carry me. I knew of a tree that grew right outside the operating-room. I used to shinny up it, and, hidden in the branches, I watched the doctors and nurses patch up many a patient.

"One day a man was brought in badly banged up from a street-car accident. I couldn't see all I wanted to from my tree, so I got my nerve up and walked right in the front door and up to the operating-room. Maybe they thought I was a relative of the victim; anyhow, they let me stay.

"After that, I never had to climb the tree again. I came in regularly by the front door."

THUS, direction was given to ambition, and the ragged Bundesen boy in the shack back of the saloon determined to be a doctor.

From this time on, everything else became of secondary importance. Money he had none, save what he earned. So for fifteen years he got whatever jobs he could, and went to school between times.

"I can't begin to remember all the jobs I had, because as soon as I saved some money I quit and went back to school. I got my meals in saloons and the cheapest restaurants. But the last penny would finally go, and I would have to give up for a while and get another job.

"When I was working daytimes, I used to go to night school. When I was going to school, days, I worked at night. For years I never got more than five or six hours of sleep.

"After I got into college" (he went to Northwestern University first, and to the Northwestern Medical School later), "I was holding myself down to two meals a day. But I landed a job firing the furnace and waiting on table in a boarding-house, and that gave me a room and three meals a day."

Many a college boy has fired a furnace or waited table, and never suffered a bit from it. But how many boys, even animated by a powerful desire to finish college, would have had the moral courage to take one of the many jobs that Bundesen gladly accepted?

"At that time," he explained, "the old Washington Park race track was going full blast. There were races every Saturday all summer long.

"It was before the days of the automobile. Great crowds of people used to drive out to the track on Saturdays and Sundays, and most of them went by way of Cottage Grove Avenue. So I was able to get a job as extra street cleaner, working only on Saturdays and Sundays.

"Besides my wages, I was permitted to keep the sweepings and sell them. Usually I got from sixty to eighty cents a week for the two days' sweepings."

But what did Bundesen's fellow-students think of one who, over the week-ends, became a "white wing"?

"Socially," he said, "I was pretty much an outcast. Though some of the fellows were really very decent to me.

"Those were menial jobs I took. Not many wanted them. But it never gave me a worry what others thought. In my own mind, I was determined that nothing should keep me from graduating.

"I remember the softest job I had," Doctor Bundesen smiled. "A great deal of discussion had gone on in newspapers and magazines, because canners were using sodium benzoate as a preservative in certain foods.

"Dr. Harvey Wiley was chief of the United States Public Health Service at the time, and he determined to get at the truth of the matter, and find out just what effect sodium benzoate has on the human constitution. An experiment was to be conducted simultaneously at several universities, and ours was one of them.

"Half a dozen volunteers were needed. The university was to feed them free for a six-months period. The joker was that while, some of the time, there was to be no sodium benzoate in the food, at other times it was to contain a little bit or a great deal, as the case might be; and the volunteers were never to know how much there was, or whether there was any.

"Under the circumstances, volunteers were scarce. But when I heard they were going to furnish free meals, I joined up in a hurry!

"A kitchen and dining-room were installed in one of the college buildings. Our health was under steady observation. For me, it was gravy and hot biscuits. We were served steaks, chicken, and lots of other good things.

"Once or twice I came near having fainting spells, when the doses of sodium benzoate were specially heavy. But that was all.

"On the whole, I suspect that the food was much better for me than the meals I had been accustomed to, grabbed mostly in saloons or wherever I could get them cheap, or free."

AT THE age of twenty-seven, Herman Bundesen finally achieved his ambition, and was graduated from the Northwestern Medical School.

Immediately following graduation, he entered the medical corps of the army, where he served as a lieutenant for three years. He also took a post-graduate course at the Army Medical School at Washington.

His interest from the first centered more on public health work than on individual practice, therefore, in 1913, he returned to Chicago and took the Civil Service examination, which enabled him to obtain a place in the city health department. He worked in various departments, each advancement that he won resulting from taking another Civil Service examination. In 1922 he was appointed health commissioner, with administrative oversight of thirteen thousand people.

This was a personal triumph for Doctor Bundesen, for it was the first time in the history of the city that a health commissioner was appointed from the ranks. He continued to hold his office through two changes of party in the mayor's office, and it was not until late in 1927 that he was replaced, for some political reason.

From a host of offers, Doctor Bundesen immediately chose one as medical director for the sanitary district of Chicago, and another as health editor of the Chicago "Daily News." These positions enlarged his field of service.

It was as health commissioner that Doctor Bundesen first made his great reputation, partly as a battler of sickness, but more as the champion and preacher of good health.

"WHEN I went into office," he told me, "I made two resolutions regarding my personal conduct. I resolved, first, that I would never 'play politics' or in any way compromise my honesty. I did this because I believe in God and have a religion —not that I am credulous, but a man lives better when his spiritual life rests on something firm and eternal. So I believe that any man who compromises with honesty denies his religion and his God.

"My second resolution arose out of the fact that I knew I should have to meet peculiar situations. As an example, the lists of babies born in the city were available to private corporations interested in selling various products to the parents. Some of these concerns were quite unscrupulous, and by circulating misinformation succeeded in getting mothers to do things that resulted, in many cases, in death.

"Well, I wanted a rule of action that would guide me in such cases, and this is what I worked out:

"I will never step on any man's toes so long as there is firm ground elsewhere. But if another man's toes cover the only ground in sight, I will step on them and step hard."

There was a third resolve, or policy, underlying these two, which Doctor Bundesen once stated in these words:

"A great city's health commissioner should be doing something besides nailing a red sign on a citizen's door, and saying, 'You dassn't do something!'"

So in constructive work his administration was a steady, splendid fight.

"We found by actual canvass," Doctor Bundesen went on, "that mothers of new babies were being solicited by from ninety to one hundred agents, to buy sets of books, patent diapers, open savings accounts, and what not—some good, some bad. But the worst solicitation came from concerns which were pushing patent baby foods.

"'Feed your baby from a bottle,' they urged. 'It will be better for you, and the

Where working together is everything

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

It is the aim of the Bell System that anyone anywhere in the country can pick up a telephone and talk to anyone anywhere else clearly and without delay. That is the meaning of universal service. To provide it, the means of telephoning must be uniformly good. Each of the 24 operating companies of the Bell System has full access to all the improvements and methods that are continually being made.

There are 5000 workers on the staffs of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Bell Laboratories whose sole occupation is to develop constantly improving methods and equipment for the 350,000 employees of the Bell System to use in serving the public. The results of the efforts are evident, not only in the extension of telephone service across the Atlantic, but in the constantly improving local and long distance service at home.

The very nature of the telephone business necessitates a single interconnected system. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company accepts its responsibility for a nation-wide telephone service as a public trust.

It is fundamental in the policy of the Company that all earnings after regular dividends and a surplus for financial security be used to give more and better service to the public.

It's News for you, too

this better, quicker way to shave

It's a way that banishes razor-pull . . . stops face smart. A scientific method of beard-softening that gets whiskers off clean and smooth. Today we offer a simple test. See coupon below; tell us where to send your seven-day tube

A MILLION steady customers! Buying only on the basis of results. Men just like yourself . . . with coarse, stubborn beards . . . and tender skins.

A million men . . . who have discarded old-fashioned shaving methods for a quicker, easier way.

There's no razor-pull, sting or smart. No drag or scrape. You get a smoother, easier shave . . . and you get it with a smile!

No other shaving cream is like Colgate's. No other can offer you such unique results.

Colgate lather is designed to absorb more water . . . to scientifically drench your beard with moisture right at the base, where the razor work is done.

It's a "small-bubble" lather. For the small bubbles hold more water and soap.

Ordinary Lather
Photomicrograph of lather of an ordinary shaving cream surrounding single hair. Large dark spots are air—white areas are water. Note how the large bubbles hold air instead of water against the beard.

Colgate Lather
Photomicrograph prepared under identical conditions shows fine, closely knit texture of Colgate's Rapid Shave Cream lather. Note how the small bubbles hold water instead of air close against the beard.

That's the scientific principle of it, men. Now here's what this small-bubble lather actually does when you start to shave:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up the oil film that covers each hair . . . floats it quickly away.

2. Then billions of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles seep down through your beard . . . crowd around each whisker . . . soak it soft with water.

Your beard gets moist and pliable—scientifically softened at the base.

You've never had a shave like this before. You've never known such comfort. Seven shaves, just like the one described in this advertisement are now offered in the coupon below.

We'll gladly send a generous sample of our After-Shave also; men are turning to it by the thousands.

baby too; and you'll be free to go about as much as you like.'

"Many a mother listened and believed. We found that about eighty of every hundred babies in Chicago were bottle-fed. Medical statistics all agree that the breast-fed baby, other things being equal, is the strong baby, and that of the babies that die in the dangerous first year, the majority are bottle-fed.

"I decided that the information that mothers received was henceforth going to be honest information, as far as lay in our power. So I stopped the general circulation of the baby lists, and got a council order forbidding their publication in the future.

"Immediately, a storm of protests arose from the concerns that made their living out of these lists. Lawsuits were threatened, but never one was filed. Representatives from four different concerns offered me, personally, as much as fifty cents per name if I would let them have the lists. And there are some sixty thousand babies born in Chicago every year!

"'It's being done regularly in other cities,' they said. 'You're a fool not to do it too.'

"But I kept on being a fool!"

DOCTOR BUNDESEN began an intensive publicity campaign for good health among babies, probably the most far-reaching campaign of its kind ever conducted in any city. He wrote a book about baby care. There were no city funds available for the publication of the book. He therefore went to several wealthy men, explained his aims and needs, and they financed the book for him.

No copy has ever been sold for profit. Had profit been the object, Doctor Bundesen would have made thousands of dollars from royalties. Over a million copies of the book have been presented to Chicago parents alone, and it is now used by the health departments of several other great cities. One life insurance company distributed three quarters of a million copies, and it has been translated into half a dozen languages for distribution overseas.

A second book, "The Growing Child," followed the baby book. It is a complete outline of personal hygiene, packed full of facts, with diet lists and practical rules for heathful living, and intended fully as much for the adult as for the child.

One or two specific results of Doctor Bundesen's campaigns are as follows: The figures of bottle-fed and breast-fed babies are just about reversed from what they were. Whereas some twenty per cent of the babies in Chicago used to get mother's milk, eighty per cent get it today. Furthermore, under his administration, Chicago came to have the lowest death rate among children under one year of age of any of the large cities of this country. These were outstanding facts about an administration conceived in high honesty, and conducted with rare energy and intelligence.

"More and more," he said, "I am impressed with the fact that the great health need of the average man is prevention rather than cure. The more we learn about health, the less we need to know about sickness.

"I couldn't, of course, in a short interview, outline a complete health program. But a few high lights stand out promi-

Portrait painted for The Hoover Company by Paul Trebilcock

—but I Can't Say This to My Husband

MY HUSBAND will give me this Christmas, as he does every year, some lovely and very useless trinket. He likes to be extravagant and a little foolish in his gift to me.

But sometimes I wish—how can I say it? He wants so much to please me—only, like other men, he's a bit unseeing.

To him I'm still the girl he married. Young and strong and radiant with health. He doesn't know — no one but the woman who cares for a home can know — how much of that youth and strength and health can slip from one under the burden of cleaning duties heavier than they need be.

Yet how can I suggest the gift I really want? He would only laugh at me. Tell me that Christmas is no time for such a sensible purchase. That I must have something for myself.

If only he could see that what I want is for myself. More for myself than any pretty trinket. That it means the very preservation of those things about which he cares so much. My youth. Freshness. That sparkle of unwearied health.

I can't say this to my husband. But I can say it to other husbands like mine:

Give her this year what she really wants. A Hoover.

nently from my experience in meeting thousands face to face from the platform, and through the work in the health department, and here.

"I'd say, for example, as fundamental gospel, that every man ought to think positively about keeping well. He ought to have a regular health audit, preferably once a year, just as business houses have periodical profit and loss statements and balance sheets, to see how they stand. He ought to know at least as much about keeping his body in good running order as he knows about his automobile. He ought to understand the properties of foods well enough to be able to order a meal without missing six sevenths of the things he needs and without getting too much of some one or two things, so that his belt begins to stretch and stretch, and his heart groans. He ought to know how to sit and stand correctly, so that all the organs can function as they should. He ought to cultivate a real love for fresh air, sunshine, water, milk—yes! and even codliver oil.

"To take a particular subject: there is the question of the teeth. As a nation, I suppose we take more care of our teeth, after a fashion, than any other people on earth; and, as a nation, we have bad teeth. How can this be?

"When I am on the platform, I have a habit of bringing up this point, and then I stop and ask the audience a direct question. Almost invariably the answers follow the same formula, no matter what audience I am addressing. I say:

"'What should you do every day to have good teeth?'

"And somebody says, 'Keep them clean.'

"'How?' I ask again.

"'By looking after them.'

"'How?'

"'Go to the dentist at least three times a year.'

"'But is that all that you have to do, to go to the dentist three times a year?'

"'Brush them.'

"'Brush them with what?'

"'Antiseptically with a dentifrice.'

"At this point I break in. 'Brushing with a dentifrice,' I tell them, 'is fine as far as it goes; but it doesn't go far enough. You've got to eat food that massages the gums, and rough food that you have to chew.'

"Too many people, today, partake of soft food only; that's why their teeth and gums, in spite of being kept clean, are not in healthy condition.

"THERE are at least three or four important things to know about colds:

"First, a cold is caught from somebody who has one.

"The second fact about colds is that a majority of them can be avoided altogether if a person lives right, gives the system proper foods, and gets enough exercise and fresh air and sunshine—it isn't a question of wearing rubbers or keeping out of drafts.

"We can't avoid all the cold germs. But we can live so sanely that when the cold germ enters, it finds ample energy waiting to fight it, and to prevent it from developing.

"The third fact is that if a cold does get a start, it can often be broken up if taken in hand promptly. Incidentally, too, the most infectious period is during the first twenty-four or forty-eight hours.

If employers only realized that, and insisted on sending employees home as soon as they show symptoms of a cold, they would certainly save many, many others from suffering the same way. Moreover, they would help to cut down the death rate from pneumonia. For in the great majority of cases, pneumonia is simply a cold that was neglected. A cold can usually be broken up rather easily if a person goes to bed and does the right things during the first twenty-four hours.

"I find that I can nearly always bring on a cold if I stay indoors for four or five days, allow myself to become constipated, or stay for any length of time in hot, stuffy rooms.

"I remember on one occasion when I was coming down with a bad cold Doctor Cheney, the surgeon in charge of personnel for Armour and Company, cured me by a very simple prescription.

"He gave me a teaspoonful of baking soda—sixty grains—in a glass of water followed by a little calcium—there are a number of calcium tablets on the market.

"'These things,' he said, 'will alkaline your system. In two hours, take another teaspoonful of baking soda, and another calcium tablet. Within three hours take a half-teaspoonful of baking soda. And be sure not to eat acid foods.'

"I wonder," Doctor Bundesen interjected, "just how many of your readers would be able to say offhand what things I should not have eaten. Not many, I'll venture! We all know what oil to use in the crank case of our automobiles, but mighty few of us know what foods to put into our stomachs.

"As a matter of fact, most of our health problems," Doctor Bundesen went on, "get back, sooner or later, to diet. By the way, if you care to, I wish you would let the readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE know that if any of them are interested in my last book, 'The Growing Child,' I will be glad to send a copy free. In addition to the simpler rules of hygiene, it gives tables of the common foods that contain the proteins, carbohydrates, fats, minerals, and vitamins A, B, C, and D, which are essential to a well-balanced diet, and other material of value to adults.

"The waist line is truly called the life line. Men and women who let themselves go in this respect are, for the most part, the ones who fill early graves. We need to know whether we are putting health or disease into our stomachs; whether we are eating the right kind and the right quantity of food.

"Several months ago, I was addressing a group of employees of a great manufacturing concern, and at the end I threw the meeting open for questions, as I always do. One man asked me to tell them something about my own daily bill of fare, for I try to live up to the doctrines I preach. So I gave them an outline of a typical day.

"I told them, first of all, that I varied my diet considerably, depending on the season and that there should also be a variation for different individuals; not all engines being of the same size or in need of the same amount of fuel.

"My day starts every morning at about seven o'clock, no matter whether I went to bed the previous evening at eleven or at three.

Instead of "must" and "must not"..

new, fascinating games

"By appealing to the child's imagination with games, mothers are creating lasting habits," says Ernest Hamlin Abbott, noted authority on child guidance.

Wonderful new discoveries in child guidance show that high spirited youngsters, chock full of mischief, can be led without scolding. In many homes today sound habits are being learned—not through "must" and "must not"—but by games.

Mothers know, for instance, how much depends on the sort of breakfast children eat. Tests in the schools of great cities show that the children who do best are those who've eaten hot, cooked cereal for breakfast. To rouse enthusiasm for this important habit, this rule now hangs on the walls of 70,000 schoolrooms:

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

Mothers feel a great responsibility about it. And so they sometimes try too hard to have children eat their hot, cooked cereal. It's just human nature for these irresponsible youngsters to balk a bit when they hear "because it's good for you." The first thing they think of answering is, "Oh mother, I don't want my Cream of Wheat"—"I don't want my oatmeal"—or whatever cereal it is.

A little canny strategy on mother's part forestalls any such wail. To make it easy, a clever plan has been worked out, built on the new ideas of child guidance. A children's club called the H. C. B. turns eating Cream of Wheat into a game no child can resist.

Recommended for 32 years by leading authorities

Authorities in child health have for 32 years recommended Cream of Wheat as ideal. Here are three of their reasons:

1. It is abundantly rich in mental and physical energy—all real food.
2. Cream of Wheat is amazingly quick and easy to digest. It contains none of the harsh, indigestible part of the grain.
3. Raisins, dates, or prunes easily added while cooking, vary its creamy goodness.

Make this a regular habit with your children—start them out with a good hot bowl of Cream of Wheat every morning.

"I don't throw up the windows when I rise, and do calisthenics. No; the first thing I do is to walk into the kitchen and take a glass of water—about fourteen or fifteen swallows. It takes half a minute or so to drink it, because I don't gulp it down, but pause for a breath after each swallow or two. Hot water is better than cold, because the stomach doesn't have to warm it; but it doesn't make a great deal of difference.

"The reason for this procedure is that, when one wakes up, the stomach needs a wash. After it gets it, it is ready to receive food.

"I shave and wash and dress. The whole procedure takes not over twenty minutes. Then I put on my hat and walk around a square. Part of the time I try to walk on the balls of my feet, just to get a little more exercise. A walk like this is something anybody can indulge in.

"I now sit down to breakfast. I take some fruit in season. In winter, particularly, I take orange juice and grapefruit, so that I can alkaline the system; when the alkali reserve goes down, the cold germ has a fine opportunity to get a foothold. If strawberries, raspberries, melons, or the like, are in season, we have them. I always take some whole wheat cereal, or oatmeal, alternating from time to time with a little bran. I put some cream on it, but not much sugar, because by chewing a bit longer the salivary glands make the sugar, and too much sugar is fattening. I have an egg about three times a week, and one slice of toast made of bran, pumpernickel, or whole wheat bread. Sometimes, as a change, I indulge in pancakes made with eggs, or French-fried toast.

"Breakfast finished, I step out of the house and walk ten blocks, after which the automobile picks me up and takes me to the office.

"THE minute I hang up my hat in the office, I drink a glass of water. At ten-thirty, I take a glass of acidophilous milk. (Buttermilk would serve about as well.) At about eleven-thirty I drink more water.

"At noon, I have a bowl of soup, and in warm weather a bowl of 'half-and-half' with graham crackers. I eat a dessert, consisting in summer of fruits, and in winter of a lettuce and tomato salad, or some green stuff. Maybe, in addition to all the rest, I have some spinach. I might say here that the favorite crime of the American business man's lunch is too much meat; another is too much coffee and apple pie!

"In the evening I eat either meat or fish and two vegetables. Potatoes we nearly always have cooked with the jackets on, because about eighty per cent of the iron or vitamins is found in the peeling. The fluids in which the vegetables are cooked are all saved, as they contain over seventy-five per cent of the minerals and vitamins, and my family of six growing youngsters need vitamins. Our bread is usually whole wheat. Sometimes our dessert is fruit. But about three times a week we eat ice cream. This is given to the children as a reward for eating all the rest of the meal and taking codliver oil three times a week.

"This is not a fixed schedule, of course. We vary it.

"In the evening I often drink a glass of water. And every night before I go to bed

The gift that simplifies housekeeping

. . . and safeguards health

IF you could wrap lighter house-tasks in a nice little box and close them with a not-to-be-opened-till-Christmas seal, wouldn't you like to send them to some one you know?

Well, you can come pretty close to doing just that. A General Electric Refrigerator is one sure way to make life easier for the woman who runs the house.

It cuts her marketing trips, it simplifies her menu-planning, it gives new ease and variety to her cooking. It gives her the assurance that the food her family eats will be safely, healthfully fresh.

And now that you've decided on an electric refrigerator, consider especially this new-day General Electric. It is radically different from all others—really "years ahead" in design. It is so automatic that it never even needs oiling. All its machinery is safely sealed in an air-tight steel casing on the top.

These revolutionary refrigerators are developed, produced and guaranteed by General Electric . . . . a strong assurance of their truly superior quality.

For a completely descriptive catalog, just drop us a card asking for Booklet A-12.

Owners of These Fine Cars need never worry about

COLD

Illustrating the Stutz equipped with Pines Automatic Winterfront

THE makers of these fine cars have stopped the damage that comes from cold. Not half way. Not in a way that depends on memory. But in a way that leaves no chance for dangerous neglect. They have adopted automatic, dependable motor protection — over the radiator — where motor protection belongs.

Equip your car at the first sign of cold weather

You get the warning signal in coughing, spitting noises and delayed starting. You reach for the "choke"—and instantly a flood of raw gasoline hits ice-cold metal. Oil is washed away from glass-like surfaces. Metal grinds against metal at a terrific speed, producing friction no motor can stand. Excessive dilution follows, fouled spark plugs, extreme carbonization, corrosion and rapid cylinder wear. This is the damage you pay for in the spring. Damage that can now be totally avoided.

Pines Winterfront stops the damage of cold

Pines Automatic Winterfront completely covers the radiator, and remains closed until the motor is warm enough to operate without damage to vital parts. The shutters then begin to open, automatically, allowing the entrance of exactly enough cool air to maintain a scientifically correct temperature.

When you park your car, Winterfront closes completely while your motor is still hot. You cannot walk away and forget it. There is no chance for dangerous neglect.

With a Winterfront on your car, you "warm-up" in seconds. The "choke" habit disappears. Your motor starts quicker and easier with less battery strain. Your car is warm inside—your motor runs with summer smoothness and flexibility.

Winterfront is easily installed

Your dealer will equip your car with a Pines Automatic Winterfront in a few minutes. Moderately priced—it will pay for itself many times over—and will give you years of service. Thermostats are guaranteed. Accept no substitute. Pines Winterfront is the only automatic radiator shutter on the market. Pines Winterfront Company, 404 North Sacramento Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

Motor Protection must be AUTOMATIC

PINES WINTERFRONT —It's Automatic

I eat an apple, or, in seasons when good apples aren't obtainable, a couple of figs.

"In winter, when there isn't much sunshine, and we don't get as much of vitamin D from that source as we need, I take codliver oil three times a week. I confess that I take it in the form of tablets, instead of the oil itself, because the latter leaves a taste in my mouth for hours afterward. In this connection, I might say that out of the fifty or sixty codliver oil tablets that have been analyzed by the chemists of the American Medical Association, only one has been found to be all that is claimed for it by the makers. It is worth while to write to the headquarters of the Association, in Chicago, to learn the name of that one.

"THE windows in our bedrooms are never closed, and the heat is never turned on. I keep my office windows open most of the time, and the temperature low—a scheme that in winter is healthful, and also tends to keep unwanted visitors from making the office a loafing place!

"Each member of our family is in vigorous health. Everybody says:

"'Gee, but those six kids of yours are husky!'

"We have some difficulty keeping a housekeeper. In fact, we usually have two at once, one being in training, for, after a month or so, some kind friend who has been 'sold' on our simple dietary offers the old one three or four dollars a week more than we pay. But if it helps these friends to live longer, we have no complaint.

"You will notice that I have not mentioned coffee, tea, and tobacco. I might say that I smoke, and that no one likes a cigar better than I do; I would not ask anybody to stop smoking altogether, unless he has a weak heart or for some similar good reason. But I do believe that two or three cigars a day are plenty. It is over-use, abuse, that kills.

"The trouble with coffee and tea is the danger to the heart through over-use. Both can give a man a false feeling of well-being for a time, especially when he is tired, with the result that he takes coffee instead of resting, as he should; and unwittingly he draws on reserves of strength that he will need in later years. And when those later years arrive, he suddenly goes to pieces, and thinks he is unlucky. As a matter of fact, he has been culpably careless.

"So many people think that to eat wisely means that one can't enjoy his meals. On the contrary, I'm of the opinion that a man gets more pleasure out of a well-balanced meal than out of the other kind.

"A notion some people have, that you ought to sit down in front of a lot of predigested stuff, is not sound health policy. Usually, if you go in restaurants where they serve that kind of food, or any faddish stuff, the people look sickly and pepless.

"To sum up," Doctor Bundesen concluded, "I think these are the two biggest facts about health that I know: By right living, it is possible to add years to life. But of greater moment is the second fact, that by right living a man can also add life to his years."

NEW PERFORMANCE-NEW STYLE OLD DEPENDABILITY

In Dodge Brothers New Victory Six every feature that contributes to comfort, luxury, style and performance has been refined and improved.

Increased leg-room follows as a natural benefit of increased body-length. Generous additions to head-room and seat width are betterments that everyone will value. Likewise the increased size of the new Victory doors, the greater breadth of vision for all occupants.

Victory lines and colors are smarter than ever. The radiator is higher and more massive. Wide, one-piece fenders of improved design are distinctive beauty-assets.

True Dodge dependability is evident in every stress-sustaining part. The extra sturdy chassis frame forms part of the body, replacing body sills and dust aprons. Body overhang and many excess pounds are eliminated, together with many sources of squeaks and rattles.

Every phase of Victory performance benefits by this unique construction. In particular, roadability and riding ease become nothing less than marvelous.

You are invited to treat yourself to a Victory demonstration today.

The Kind of Radio Hour I Would Like to Put On

FIRST PRIZE

This May Be Asking a Good Deal, But—

I LIVE in a small town in North Carolina. The radio means more to folks like me and my family than can be readily understood by people who live where something is going on every minute. It is our most intimate hook-up with the outside world.

To begin with, I should like five minutes of good band or orchestra music. Something lively.

In the next five minutes, I want to know what's happening in the world.

Now for a good rousing speech from somebody, man or woman, who has opinions on some subject. Politics, religion, international relations—anything that has some good red meat in it. But remember, ten minutes is the outside limit for this sort of thing.

Five minutes of music would make a nice break at this point.

Fifth on the program I should like a ten-minute talk from someone who has had exciting adventures. One of the best things I ever heard over the radio was a talk by the man who filmed the big picture "Grass," in the wilds of Persia. This fellow made me see with his eyes and hear with his ears, and run with his legs.

Now I'd like five minutes devoted to humor. And if I could have my pick of humorists I would choose Will Rogers.

The next ten minutes I should enjoy something of an educational nature. A pointed, concise talk from some authority in the scientific or literary world would suit me down to a T.

A ten-minute playlet, or dramatic sketch, or monologue would come in nicely here.

To top off with, I should like a good old-fashioned song. And, personally, I prefer male voices, and negro spirituals and cowboy songs. J. T. S.

SECOND PRIZE

It Should Be Like a Well-Balanced Meal

THE first thing I shall do in my radio hour is to eliminate unnecessary announcements. This means that there shall be no "cute" remarks; no coaxing of this one or that "whom we all want to hear;" no explaining to "dear friends of Radioland" that our dear little Eva has a cold, but couldn't disappoint her dear friends. (If she has a cold she ought to have sense enough not to sing.)

If there is anything more tiresome than a long-winded after-dinner speaker it is the average radio announcer. When a radio announcer announces he is going to announce, it is frequently as silly as a silly girl's repetition of "And he says, and I says." My hour must be dignified.

My hour starts. The announcer states simply: "Station X." At once a national

The Joy of Living

Bells, holly, packages, memories, smiles and joys—this is Christmas!

Good friends and kin are all at once a part of joyful life. It is good to live and give!

This for Brother and that for Mother with all the tingling satisfaction of selecting well and knowing that the Christmas seal hides a host of pleasures.

The pleasure of giving and receiving an Illinois Watch will not be momentary, but will last and grow with increasing pride in its sheer beauty and faithful service as a precious timepiece.

Behind such a gift are more than 50 years of Illinois painstaking craftsmanship and science—a half century of building more than a fine watch, a great American watch.

The Marquis-Autocrat. An unusual watch in both performance and appearance. A rare combination of the dignity of a pocket piece with the attractive influence of unconventional design. In 14k gold-filled cushion-shaped case, this 17-jewel watch deserves its popularity. $55.

The Berkeley. This charming watch has a delicate tracery of design in dark red and black hard enamel inlaid in its 14k white gold-filled case. A 17-jewel watch of Illinois craftsmanship, which insures dependable timekeeping. $55.

The Beau Brummell is style plus! Tailored to the wrist, the eye and the heart. It is one of those watches that improve with the wearing, creating new pride of possession each day. Illinois tradition underwrites its fine 17-jewel movement in beautiful 14k gold-filled case. $50.

The A. Lincoln. A watch of quality and refinement in perfect harmony with the greatness of the name it bears. A dignified watch of unfailing dependability for men of affairs. Fine 19-jewel movement, 14k solid gold case, sterling silver dial with raised gold figures. $110.

air is played, spiritedly. Then a brief account of the important events of the day, without comments. I do not mean political or unimportant items, but the real news of the world, with perhaps a statement of past events that made this date historical. Not more than fifteen minutes for this.

The next quarter of an hour would be devoted to the best music, instrumental or vocal; classical music rendered by good musicians. The simple announcement of each number would be sufficient.

Then for fifteen minutes I'd have the snappiest, latest dance hits, a quarter of an hour of noise and "pep." There is a time to dance! we are told. This is my time.

The last quarter of an hour I should give to songs—old songs that everyone loves. Just before "signing off" to close my hour there would be one old non-sectarian hymn. B. E. P.

THIRD PRIZE

I'd Like to Get It Without "Shopping" for It

WOULDN'T it be nice if we could find table d'hôte programs to suit our individual tastes without having to twirl dials all evening in the hope of assembling sixty minutes of entertainment, as one scoops dishes onto one's tray in a cafeteria?

Of course it's one thing to map out a program for your own delight; but when it's scheduled for the hours between eight and eleven at night you have to give a thought to the neighbors who drop in now and then.

In the first place, I'd give the professional announcers a rest. I'd find some master of ceremonies with a pleasing voice to act as introducer for Our Own Hour. He should have sparkle, but he must check his wise-cracks at the door.

Just to start things off briskly, how about opening with a military march by a competent band. Three minutes. Then swing into twelve minutes of popular songs by a pair of male singers who put the lyrics across—and let's pick clever lyrics.

Then a five-minute talk on almost any subject by someone who can talk for the ordinary guy in the street and hold his attention. To paraphrase a famous editor: "There are no dull subjects; there are only dull speakers."

A little classical music; but before we go into it, a short explanatory introduction, that anyone can understand—something about the significance and the interpretation of the selection. Fifteen minutes.

A good tenor and soprano offering, and one week, a program of the better songs—not jazz—from current musical comedies; another week, songs of ten years ago; while still another week, popular songs of the nineties. Ten minutes.

Wind up with jazz and a final rousing military march. The latter will be a sop to those who can't stand jazz.

Playlets, lectures, movie-fan chats, kitchen hints, sport talks, and the like—these we may leave to the other hours. They can be picked up occasionally, when one is in a "shopping mood"—as one will now and then embark on a departure and order cheesecake or meringues after years of sticking to rice pudding. D. L.

The White Fireman takes a hand in chimney construction

THE interest at 5% on a half-billion dollars is the amount that faulty chimneys and flues add to America's annual fire loss.

Knowing this loss to be strictly preventable, the White Fireman set about to find a remedy for the condition. Years of research work enabled him to prepare a practical ordinance for chimney construction, suitable for cities and towns of any size. After securing the general approval of architects, heating engineers and building material manufacturers he started his efforts to have his ordinance adopted by city governments.

The White Fireman's work is being justified by the daily increase in the number of municipalities which are writing the ordinance upon their statute books. It appears certain that his principles of chimney construction will become generally accepted throughout the United States. Thus this one phase of the White Fireman's loss-prevention work will be instrumental in wiping out one of the greatest causes of preventable fire loss.

THE White Fireman symbolizes the Loss-Prevention Service supported by insurance companies. This service includes: Consultation on proposed structures, that they may be as fire-safe as possible. Inspection of property, with recommendations for the reduction of fire-hazards. Maintenance of the Underwriters' Laboratories for the testing of building materials, the practical trial of fire extinguishers and other protective equipment, the examination of electrical apparatus and materials. Various other kinds of technical assistance for the furtherance of property conservation. The North America Agent will tell you how to secure this valuable service.

The Silent Minstrel

Vance Crowley stared at her in amazement a moment, then he put one hand over hers as if to still its searchings, and he said:

"You poor, dear, ridiculous infant!"

The sudden tenderness of his tone made the hot tears leap to her eyes; the room swam before her in a vague mist of unreality. And Vance Crowley slowly muttered, "I'll . . . be . . . jiggered!"

Cecilia tried to laugh, a laugh which caught somewhere in her throat and did not succeed very well. At once she hid behind the mirror of her purse and dabbed at her nose and eyes with a powder puff.

"Now," he said brusquely as he looked at his watch, "I have exactly eight minutes left before my cue. . . . Tell me, why did you come here?"

Cecilia considered. "I think," she said, with a rare glimpse of understanding, "it was because I'm so awfully young—if I'd been older—"

"Please don't ever grow older, Cecilia."

"If I'd been older, I'd have thought—"

"Exactly! You would have thought about what other people would have thought . . . and that is why we sometimes gain sense and lose intelligence with the years."

She pondered this philosophy a moment, and gave it up. "And then," she said impulsively, "everybody has been nasty to me lately—just mean."

ALL her confidence returned with this delightful theme. As if she had known Vance Crowley for years, she told him about the high-school dance that evening, about Edward, her mother, her home . . . everything that had touched her life in far-away Flatbush. With sudden boldness, she told him about the phonograph record and how she had played it every day. Her words came in quick, fierce rushes.

"And so tonight, you know, when I heard from Edward about how people were talking about me, I just came here. I thought that—I really didn't think about it. Maybe if I had I wouldn't have come . . . but you don't quite look like I thought—"

"Dreams never do when they become realities," he said. "At this moment I am having dreams about you, about having dinner with you sometime, about singing to you, about dancing with you; but I know that they will never be anything but dreams. . . . And that is why it is better to stay young."

Suddenly he regarded her with such severity that she was amazed. There was no explaining this man; he could be tender in one moment and stern in the next.

"At your age," he scolded, "think of going to meet a stranger in a night club! I never heard of such a thing! Why, you ought to be home and in bed at this very minute. You ought to be studying your lessons. I'll wager that you don't know what the capital of Guatemala is, or how many parts Cæsar divided Gaul into, or what is the square root of x. You ought to wear your skirts longer, and you have too much rouge on, and you ought not to know there is such a thing as a night club. I've a good notion to telephone for the strictest chaperon on Manhattan Island, and have you taken home this minute. I've a good notion to spank you!"

"No! No!" she wailed. "I don't want to go home. . . . And, anyhow, I can stay out until twelve-thirty tonight because the Junior Dance lasts that long."

She was genuinely frightened. Her last lovely illusions came tumbling down about her head like a house of cards. . . . A chaperon! Her parents had never voiced such strict, old-fashioned ideas of conduct as this worldly minstrel in evening clothes. And his air of authority carried conviction.

"Please!" she whispered.

"Even Cinderella," he said, "had to go home at midnight, and yet you want to stay until twelve-thirty! I really don't know what young girls are coming to."

HE GLANCED at his watch again, and told her that it was only a minute or two until he must sing. With sad resignation Cecilia reached for her gloves and purse. "I guess," she said dolefully, "that I ought to go now—"

Vance Crowley touched her hand again, and his touch was almost shy. "My dear little Cinderella," he said, "of course you ought to go. But, instead, you are going to wait until I sing two, maybe three silly songs, and then we are going to dance . . . didn't you know that?"

Without another word he got up and sauntered toward the stage.

He was greeted by three expensively gowned women at various tables he passed, not to mention a dozen men who appeared to be celebrities. The hostess introduced him with a new air of deference she had not shown to other entertainers; the crowd received him with noisy affection, as if he were an old acquaintance.

Cecilia had forgotten for the moment that he was, after all, Vance Crowley; now she was properly awed. To think that he was returning to dance with her!

He stood languidly leaning against the piano during the opening chords. Nobody could have said that he was a handsome man—he was not even romantically homely, lacking a touch of gray at the temples—but there was something about his dark battered face which made anybody look twice . . . and most women three times.

His voice was a drawling tenor, always as intimate as if it were addressed to one listener instead of the thousands who went to night clubs and bought phonograph records and tuned in their radios. It was a voice which said to life, "Oh, what does it matter?" and then with husky sweetness made everything matter very much—such things as dusk and dawn, a girl's remembered laugh, an almost forgotten dance, that canoe ride last summer. It lied bravely about those moments and took no note of tomorrow.

"Muddy water all around my feet;
Muddy water up and down the street;
Muddy water in mah shoes,
Rockin' to those low-down blues. . . ."

He stood at the edge of the little stage, leaning forward slightly, his shoulders swaying almost imperceptibly to the rhythm of the jazz. His eyes looked over the heads of the people at the tables as if he were recalling a scene he had known long ago:

"I've got my toes turned Dixie way,
'Round that delta let this old boy lay.
My heart cries out for muddy water!"

Cecilia leaned forward, and as she listened she said to herself in a terrified whisper, "I'm in love!" Her breath came very fast. Under the table her hands closed and unclosed. "Why! I'm in love. Yes, I'm in love!"

All her life she had wondered what it would be like, and now she knew. It hurt terribly. It was so different from the times she had imagined herself interested in some sleek high-school youth.

She hardly heard the hand-clapping of the crowd as the singer finished. She scarcely noticed that he had begun another song. She could only stare at the stage with eyes that had suddenly become piteous and stricken. . . .

A little while ago she had seen Vance Crowley for the first time and she had been disillusioned, for he had fallen so far short of the romantic vision of evenings when she listened to a phonograph record. But the dreams of a young girl are glib dreams, and need only a little fact to nourish them . . . already the real Vance Crowley had supplanted and dethroned her illusion, and she repeated endlessly within her untried heart, "Why! I must be in love."

At the end of his second song the applause was so insistent that an encore could not be denied. Then Cecilia heard him saying a few words to the crowd about "this number by special request, an old one that you forgot two years ago;" and he was strolling among the tables chanting:

"Sweet child!
You're driving me wild,
Say, honest and true,
Sweet child,
I'm wild about you. . . ."

When he returned, brushing aside stares and greetings with the ease of a man used to the praise of the crowd, he found Cecilia sitting very tense and still and white; and she did not look up as he took the seat opposite her. "Goodness, child!" he exclaimed. "What can be wrong?"

"I don't know," she said miserably.

VANCE CROWLEY regarded her with gentle wonder a moment, and maybe he was recalling how very difficult it is to be eighteen years old, for he said, "Shall we dance? You must never forget to dance, Cecilia, when anything hurts you."

They danced. The music was a lilting, care-free one-step which laughed at love and youth and song; and Vance Crowley was quite right—at once Cecilia's spirits leaped buoyantly in response; she was proud and gay as she saw people watching them from the tables around. She even liked his rather careless, awkward steps, and did not mind bumping into other dancers in the packed square of floor . . . it seemed so much more sophisticated than the practiced and self-conscious grace of her high-school admirers. . . . And now it was Vance Crowley's turn to be grave for a moment while she chattered breathlessly with her face close to his shoulder.

"It's nearly time," he said soberly,

Take your first bite. Isn't the crust short and tender? And the rich, luscious mince meat—Heinz Mince Meat—tasting of juicy apples and plump raisins and currants . . . of tender little morsels of meat — of candied citron and lemon peel. What a mince pie—every delicious, fruity bite of it !

We don't wonder that most women have given up making their own mince meat. For it does take such a lot of time and patience and skill.

We know. For our own mince meat, we go to extraordinary pains to find the ingredients that give us exactly the flavor and "mince-meat-iness" we want.

"Four Crown" Valencia Raisins from Spain, Grecian Case Currants, candied Leghorn fruits—citron and lemon peel — juicy apples, prime beef . . . And—most important—to secure our spices we send our representatives to the very ends of the world.

Then the blending according to an exclusive Heinz recipe. And the experience! For, after all, it is our 59 years of experience that has made the name Heinz mean Flavor.

during the interlude, "that we were going . . . and then there will be no more Cecilia." He stopped, and then went on as if he were talking to himself. "And yet—do you suppose that there could be more? H'm!"

"Why, of course!" cried Cecilia. "There is always more of everything . . . always, always!" She was very brave, very gay.

"Is there?" he mused; but his eyes did not quite believe—they had seen too many things.

"I can meet you and have dinner sometimes, and sometimes on Saturday night we could dance, maybe, and maybe you could come out and see me; that is, if you don't mind Flatbush too much. It isn't wonderful, like these places you are used to but—oh, there was something I did want to ask you!"

"What is that, Cecilia?"

"I wondered if you could—if you would"—she paused, a little entangled and confused by her boldness—"if you would make a phonograph record for me sometime . . . just for me?"

"Yes, Cecilia." He smiled whimsically.

"Won't that be won-derful!" She was very much a schoolgirl at this moment, all her amusing pretensions of sophistication fallen from her like an ill-fitting garment. "Then I can show it to Edward sometimes, and he'll be furious!"

"You mustn't tease Edward."

"But boys are so funny that you can't help it sometimes."

The jazz stopped short with a final chuckle; the dance had ended, and they went slowly back to their table. Vance Crowley glanced at his watch and called the waiter. But Cecilia clapped both hands over her ears, crying,

"I know what you're going to say. Please don't!"

"CINDERELLA," he said tersely, "it is midnight!"

She did not protest further as he paid a fabulous price for the fabulous club sandwich and then helped her on with her cloak. They followed a reverent head waiter to the door and went out into the gilt and marble lobby where Broadway's incandescence jested with the cool dark night.

And there, standing on the sidewalk outside, was Edward, very pale and determined.

"Why—Edward!" said Cecilia.

Without looking at her he walked straight up to Vance Crowley. It was plain that the boy was tremendously moved; he spoke with an effort in a low, shaken voice:

"You've got to quit this—or else you've got to fight me, that's all!" And he stood there doggedly, although his hands were trembling.

Vance Crowley surveyed the youth who stood squarely in his path. He surveyed him first with utter amazement, then with curiosity, and finally with irritation. "My dear young man," he said, "what can be troubling you?"

Edward dropped his eyes a moment before the singer's steady inspection. He pointed toward Cecilia, who stood motionless with fright and embarrassment.

"It's her! I mean—you can't be with her this way. I won't have it! She's too young to know." The boy was almost sobbing in his desperation. "Probably you can lick me, but I don't care. I followed her here tonight, and I've been waiting two hours to tell you—"

Over Vance Crowley's features crept a reluctant admiration and respect for this scared boy who was so valiant in the protection of the girl he adored. It would have been easy to annihilate him with irony, to bring him to ignoble tears with ridicule or a hundred other weapons which belong to age and experience; but Vance Crowley merely said:

"Maybe we'd all better take a taxicab. We can talk more freely then. And later," he added politely, "if we should decide to fight, I think it could be arranged."

THE two youngsters followed him trustfully to the curb. They waited while he hailed a cab, and allowed him to help them in, with sudden reliance on his savoir faire to ward off this appalling situation they had pulled down upon themselves. They were frightened and their faces showed it. But neither dared look at the other; both of them watched Vance Crowley appealingly.

Edward could conceal nothing, and his face reddened with sudden shame which engulfed his youthful soul. "Say," he gulped, and it took more courage to make this apology than to offer battle, "I guess maybe I was mistaken—you know. I guess—"

"Sure," said Vance Crowley, "I understand, old man."

Edward's throat tightened and a quick mist came over his eyes. He awkwardly extended his hand. "You're a good egg!" he said in a solemn voice, for he knew no greater compliment to pay. . . . Without smiling, Vance Crowley shook hands.

Then he leaned back against the cushions as if he were tired, and for a time he looked out at Broadway, flowing past like a swift river of dreams. So many people had dreamed on Broadway, it made no difference to the river if now and then a dream could not come true. The river flowed on just the same. . . .

After he had looked at Broadway a while, he turned to those two children who faced him so confidingly. They had youth. They would go on, like Broadway, while dreams lived and died and new dreams were born. They were the everlasting Cinderella and the Prince—they owned all of life.

"I think," said Vance Crowley, "that I'll just let you kids off at the next subway station; then I'll go back and read over my new song."

He got out and bade them good night. It was then that Cecilia found her voice for the first time since Edward's appearance:

"But you are going to see me again? You are going to make that record you promised me?"

He smiled. "I shall make the record for you," he said. He lifted his hat and turned hurriedly to the cab, which waited with throbbing motor. In the gaping entrance to the subway station Cecilia paused; but Vance Crowley drove away without once looking back.

Edward and Cecilia rode nearly out to Flatbush before a word was spoken. She stared at the blackness of the opaque window with angrily blinking eyes, while "Pink tooth brush"? Heed its warning!

DO not neglect a tell-tale tinge of "pink" that may appear upon your morning tooth brush! Do something about it! For it is a sign and symptom that something is amiss with your gums.

If you talk to your dentist he will tell you that gum troubles arise from the food you eat. For it is too soft. It lacks the wholesome roughage that should keep the blood briskly astir in the tiny capillaries of the gum tissue.

Result—gums grow idle, inactive, dormant. They become soft and sensitive to the brush. They lose their normal tonicity and bleed easily. Worse troubles may be on the way.

Massage of the gums is the simple restorative measure that specialists find so helpful. It is easily performed—with the brush or with the fingers—twice a day at the time you brush your teeth. And thousands of good dentists order their patients to use Ipana Tooth Paste for the massage as well as for the regular cleaning with the brush.

Ipana and massage maintain the gums in health

For Ipana is a tooth paste specifically compounded to tone and stimulate the gums while it cleans the teeth. It contains ziratol, an ingredient well known to dentists for its antiseptic and hemostatic properties.

So make a test of this modern tooth paste. The coupon, of course, will bring you a ten-day trial—enough to acquaint you with Ipana's cleaning power and its delightful flavor. But the better plan is to start at once with a full sized tube from the druggist. That is the fairer test of Ipana's power to improve the health of your gums.

the boy doggedly looked down at his feet. They were both very unhappy.

"You don't blame me, do you?" the boy asked finally.

"I hate you!" choked Cecilia.

They walked the two or three blocks from the subway station to her home in groping silence. In front of the house there was an awkward moment. They looked at each other in the dimness. Edward began haltingly, "I didn't mean to—"

"I never want to see you again!" she cried, and ran to the door.

From her up-stairs window she watched him still standing there in the street. He did not know that she had seen him . . . nor did he know that she cried herself to sleep, as girls sometimes do.

During the next several days they passed each other on the way to high school, but Cecilia hurried by with averted face, while Edward flushed to his ears. And in youthful social circles it was whispered, "They're mad . . . Edward and Cecilia!"

She felt herself wrapped in mystery as she went into the little grocery store at "the corner" on an errand for her mother; she felt that these Flatbush folk must somehow know that strangeness had touched her life. But to her disappointment they did not seem to be talking about her; they did not seem even to be thinking about her.

Each evening she waited feverishly for the mail. But it was four or five days before it came, a thin parcel wrapped in brown paper and addressed to "Miss Cecilia Kirby" in a bold hand that once before had seemed to her like a romantic message scrawled across the white page of a young girl's experience.

AT DUSK, when her parents had gone to the lodge meeting and her brother was playing basketball, Cecilia was at last alone in the house. She approached the phonograph, holding in her unsteady hand a wax disk which was smooth on one side with a narrow series of grooves on the other. She wound the ancient machine and put the needle in place on the record . . . but before she turned it on she powdered her nose and nibbled an old chocolate she had found in her bureau. Then, tremulously, she seated herself in ceremony. . . . At first there was only a cold scratching, then came that voice she had listened to so many times—the weary troubadour.

"My dear little Cinderella," he said, "there are not many things I can say to you, for you have all things yet to say. You are very young, and life will listen to you. . . ."

There was a long pause as if the unseen speaker were considering something—and all the time the needle kept on scratching coldly.

"I thought I would sing to you," the troubadour went on; "but I do not feel like singing. Anyhow, song is only plain, everyday speech wearing the harlequin's mask of harmony, and since I sing for my supper, I would much rather talk to you, dear Cinderella. But what can I say? . . . That I shall never see you again?"

Her breath caught, but she leaned forward to catch every drawling word of that husky voice.

"Can I make you believe that it is best? For there comes a midnight to every Cinderella, and sometime, when you are older, my dear, you will know that the bright trappings of romance change all too quickly into the kitchen aprons of everyday life if you stay overlong at the ball. That is the reason why the Cinderella legend is still one of the greatest stories ever told. Because it is true. Do not forget that it is true, Cecilia, or life will sometime remind you when you are forty. . . . Now do you know why I shall never try to see you again?"

This time there was a pause so long that it seemed the minstrel was forever silent. Cecilia sat leaning forward, listening to the grate of the needle and, far away on the outside, the homely sounds of Flatbush. There were only a few more words:

"Cecilia, I hope that you will dance and be gay. That is all. Good-by, sweet child."

The needle wound its way to the end, and the machine turned off with an abrupt click.

CECILIA did not put on the record again that evening. She sat a long time before the phonograph, and when she arose the dusk had turned from mauve into a deep shadowy purple. She went out on the porch and stood there, a slim, still silhouette against the dimness of early night. . . . A little while she remained motionless upon the porch, but during those few minutes she left off being a girl and began being a woman. She would always remember to dance; but deep in her heart was buried her first fleeting love . . . and that is the way a young girl grows up.

It was not surprising that Edward came past; each evening he had been miserably pacing around the Kirbys' block. He saw Cecilia, and stopped short, in his embarrassment. And for the first time in several days Cecilia really noticed him.

"Hello, Edward," she said.

"Hello, Cecilia."

They looked at each other uneasily, pretending that nothing had ever happened.

"What are you doing tonight?" he asked.

"Oh, nothing."

"Let's go have a sundae."

"All right."

Arm in arm, they walked down the quiet street together under the first shy stars; and in the early darkness the echo of their footsteps sounded like faint whisperings.

"GIVE ME THREE YEARS," says Walter Damrosch, famous musical conductor, "and I will make America the most musical country in the world." Already the Damrosch radio concerts have intrigued millions of children and grown-ups. And this is only the beginning. Next month Graham McNamee explains the marvelous scheme for a great air university which will offer a thorough training in the cultural arts. "You may soon tune in," someone has said, "and get your college education at home."

Wives Are Either Tightwads or Spendthrifts

You can state as an axiom that money cannot be mentioned in the marital circle without a rumpus. It can't be done. The most innocent reference to dollars and cents will result in a most tremendous and recriminating battle, which may ramify far from the original casus belli but derives therefrom and therefrom only.

I was at a neighbor's the other night, and during the course of as amiable a conversation as I ever participated in the husband turned casually to his wife and said —not in a tone of complaint, not bickeringly or naggingly, but merely as one who makes an observation of casual interest— "Taxes come this month."

Now what could be more innocent than that; but the lovely lady sat erect, assumed the brave but suffering expression of a martyr and replied, "Then I sha'n't get that new dress, dear." She added the "dear" out of pure malice. I saw the husband wince. In fact, I could have predicted the wince, and knew exactly what he would say next, and he said it:

"What in thunder has that to do with it?"

"I didn't think when I said anything about that new dress that it was going to make it hard for you," she replied, keeping strictly to ritual.

"Now what in thunder have I said!" exclaimed the helpless and exasperated husband.

"Nothing. You didn't say anything. Of course you didn't say anything, and I don't want a new dress anyhow. I wouldn't have a new dress. If you were to bring a dozen new dresses in here this minute I'd—I'd throw them out of the window."

"You would, eh?" says the husband. "By heck, I'd like to see you. I'd like to see you throw a dress out of the window that I brought you."

Which moment I seized to withdraw. They never noticed my departure.

I HAVE seen the like happen so many times that I can repeat the dialogue word for word and letter for letter. Now, from observations of such scenes in all walks of life, from the cozy cottages of millionaires to the sumptuous apartments of day laborers, I am able to state positively that no man can mention money in his home without hurting his wife's feelings. Barring, of course, a raise in salary, or a profit of a hundred thousand in the stock market. But satisfy yourself with giving the good news and refrain from talking about what you will do with it, or the rug will be wet with tears, doors will slam, and the gentleman will go out for a long, disgruntled walk in the cool of the evening.

Forty years ago the situation was not so acute as it is today. In the first place, most folks so long ago as that didn't have much money to argue about. People used to live well, buy a home, and raise a family of children on fifty dollars a month, and a dollar a day was pretty good pay. Families took up so much time making both ends meet that they didn't have time to squabble about anything. The ordinary family didn't feel it had to keep a cook, a butler, a maid, and a chauffeur. And the husband and wife who could maintain a horse and buggy were of the high aristocracy.

But since then a lot of gadgets have been invented and the human race has progressed, in one direction or another— forward or backward. Take your choice. These inventions, such as motor cars and radio, and this and that and the other, have enriched the nation. But the most malign invention of all is the one which has made the world unsafe for husbands, and that is retail credit.

I say invention. There was such a thing as retail credit forty years ago, but it didn't amount to much. People ran weekly grocery bills and the like, but when the ordinary man went to get a suit of clothes he had his fifteen dollars ready in his pants pocket to pay for it, and when his wife went to get a new dress she bought the goods and had the family dressmaker make it for day's wages. There wasn't much credit, and the man who owed a bill was looked at in his town much the same way as the town drunkard. To owe money was almost as bad as to steal money.

As a matter of fact, to my weak, wavering intellect, it still is—if you don't pay it. I've never been able to see the difference between tunking a man on the cranium and departing with his watch, and buying an evening gown from him for which you never pay.

MARRIAGE, as someone has observed before, and very acutely, is a sort of a kind of a partnership. Now, according to the laws of the land, one partner may bind another by his acts or dealings if they be within the range of the business for which they have joined together. For what one partner does the other is responsible. The difference between a business partnership and a marriage partnership is right in this range of business thing. In matrimony there isn't any range of business.

This is particularly hard on the husband, because generally he is the half of the partnership which earns the money. It is his duty to earn it, and then to get himself the reputation for being a good husband by wearing a set of little old last year's pants in order that his wife may go to the Jenkins's dinner party in a shell-pink creation. It may be observed and objected to by wives—and there must be at least one to every husband—that this article is written from the masculine point of view. It is.

So here we stand with the situation something like this: A wife can go out and buy any dog-gone thing she can get, and charge it to her husband, and the poor wretch has to pay for it or go into bankruptcy. He is utterly helpless. All his defenses have been snatched away from him in the rising tide of woman's downward march from superiority to equality.

We have a legal state of affairs in which the wife can step out of a Wednesday afternoon and buy anything a merchant will sell her; she can tell him to send the bill to John, which he promptly does; and John has got to pay. There is nothing he can do. She can buy till it hurts—but it is John who gets hurt.

Women are all alike, only some of them are more alike than others, and one of the things in which they are alike was mentioned in glowing tributes by a couple of commuters going in on the train the other day, and I, sitting in the seat ahead, was privileged to overhear.

"I expect my wife to run bills," one man said to the other, "just as I expect it to rain. I know I've got to put up with that; but what sets me to biting the leg off the piano is that I can never find out how much she owes."

"Me, too," said the other man.

"She meets the postman," said the first speaker, "and swipes the bills. I never hear about them. Never, until she gets pushed into a corner and has to own up. But does she own up then?"

"She does not," said the second. "I know. I got hold of a bill I knew nothing about the other day—and it was a whopper. So I went to Elsie and says, 'What about this?' So she says she had been keeping it from me because she was afraid it would worry me, and she wouldn't have me worried for the world."

"I know that line," said the first.

"So I ask her if that's all she owes. I say to her, 'Let's lay the cards on the table. Tell me everything you owe, and I'll pay up and we'll have a fresh start.'"

"I've been there."

"So she told me, and I estimated what she told was, maybe, sixty per cent of it. But I was mistaken."

"It was about forty per cent," said the other.

"They can't tell you. It ain't in their nature. They'll hold back. That's the tough part of it: a husband never can tell where he stands or how much he owes, and he finds out always at the unhandiest minute."

"Sure. Just when you need money in your business along comes a letter from some lawyer telling you he'll have your blood if you don't pay some bill you never heard of."

WELL, that was that. It illustrates. No concern can do business if it doesn't keep books. It has to know its income, and it has to know how much it owes. No firm in the world could keep on doing business if it were subjected periodically to the necessity for paying large bills it never knew anything about. That would put the strongest business on the rocks; but the matrimonial partnership has to take it into consideration and weather it.

I was in my lawyer's office the other day to have a will drawn or a deed executed or my legal hair parted, and he heaved him a sigh and looked pretty glum.

"See that fellow who just went out?" he asked.

"He belongs to the lodge," said my lawyer. "And he's up against it. Just starting in business and needs every cent. Nice wife, too. He likes her. Everybody

17 friends bid him "Merry Christmas" with the same pipe tobacco

Is there a timely suggestion for Pipe Smokers on YOUR Christmas list in this letter from Mr. Fitzpatrick?

Evanston, Ill.
Dec. 31, 1927

Larus & Bro. Co.,
Richmond, Va.

Dear Sirs:

Of course you know from your sales just how popular your brands of tobacco are, but perhaps what follows will illustrate something of the identity, so to speak, of the users of Edgeworth.

I happen to be blest with a host of very fine friends, mostly "highbrows"—professors, scientists, etc. Generally at Christmas time they show their remembrance and all that with some little gift—a box of cigars, fishing tackle, a book—all that sort of thing.

Well, last Christmas many seemed to centre on tobacco. Now, mark you, these fellows have no communication with each other. They live in widely separated parts of the country, so it was no "put-up" joke on me or anything like that. But here came seventeen boxes of tobacco, and sixteen of them the familiar blue "Edgeworth"! The seventeenth was a very flossy walnut, brass-trimmed box, but if I know tobacco, the contents were Edgeworth with a little perique in it.

Just coincidence, perhaps, but a queer one. Am not an habitual smoker of Edgeworth, so they weren't catering to any especial taste of mine. Looks like a consensus of opinion among the "highbrows"—or quite a batch of 'em—that Edgeworth is the stuff, the proper caper for a gift.

Sincerely yours,

F. W. FITZPATRICK

WHEN sixteen of a man's friends each send him the same brand of tobacco for Christmas, there's no doubt about what kind of a reception it's in for!

It sounds like a deep-laid plot of collusion. But it wasn't! Each of Mr. Fitzpatrick's friends knew what his own favorite smoke was and, as if by magic, sixteen blue humidors of Edgeworth were laid under the Christmas tree.

These men, like many other Edgeworth smokers, knew from experience that the quality of Edgeworth never changed in any season, and that if a man started smoking it, it would be hard for him to leave off.

In case your friends are perhaps not as well acquainted with Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed or Edgeworth Plug Slice as you are, start them right this Christmas. We have prepared for you gaily decorated gift cartons of Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed in three forms—the standard glass pound humidor, and the attractive pound and half-pound tins. If your tobacco dealer will not supply you with these Christmas gift packages, we gladly offer this special service:

Send us $1.65 for each glass pound humidor, $1.50 for each pound tin, and 75c for each half-pound tin of Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed that you wish to be shipped; also a list of the names and addresses of those smokers you wish to remember, along with your personal greeting card. We will gladly attend to sending these gift packages direct to your friends—all delivery charges prepaid.

To those of you who are not already acquainted with the charm of Edgeworth, we should also like to send—free—generous helpings of both Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed and Edgeworth Plug Slice. Simply write your name and address to Larus and Brother Co., 45 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va.—the Edgeworth Station. Wave length 270 meters, 1110 kilocycles. Special feature: The "Edgeworth Club" Hour every Wednesday evening at nine o'clock, Eastern Standard Time.

Sometimes you find the gift you'd like to keep yourself ~

THERE'S no denying that the feeling does come. You shop around busily, penciling the list, looking about for new gifts. Then—well, there it is. You'd really like to have that one present for yourself.

When you see this Simmons watch-chain, it's likely you'll have such an urge. Why not buy the chain for your watch? It is number 30044, green-gold-filled, coming also in yellow, white, or green and white combination. Quite obviously, it was made to look well across the vest. And the reasonable price—$9—makes it easy to choose another for a friend.

The ladies' wrist band (30522) presents another difficulty! Just who shall receive so pleasant a gift? Any wrist watch will fit this band; the band will fit any wrist. The glinting white-gold-filled surface is relieved at each end with a subdued sparkle of ruby, amethyst, emerald, sapphire, aquamarine, or topaz—whichever stone you prefer. The cost of the band is $5.25.

Both the chain and the band are made in our own factory under our own patents. . . . See your jeweler now. Whether you give to others, or give to yourself, you'll find both pieces mighty acceptable. R. F. Simmons Co., Attleboro, Mass.

likes her. But about a month ago he got a bill from some dress shop for six hundred dollars. He showed it to his wife, who said there must be some mistake, so she took it and assured him she would have it straightened out. She did. So yesterday he gets a letter from a collection agency saying they were going to sue if he didn't pay $1,234.76, and pay it quick."

"Yes, yes! Go on."

"He came around to see what he could do, and I told him, Nothing. Just pay and shut up."

"'But,' he asked me, 'hasn't a husband any way of protecting himself against this kind of thing?'

"'Not a chance!' says I. So he's got to go and borrow that money. It means he can't make some necessary improvements in his business, and he's up against it."

Following which, he went on to say that I'd be surprised if I knew how many husbands in this town came to him with the same trouble, and I said right back to him, as quick as lightning, that I wouldn't be surprised a bit.

WHICH brings us to the matter of credit. By credit, I don't mean this charging thing, but the credit which is reputation in the business world for paying your bills. I heard a man talking about that on the train the other day. He is one who has as high a regard for his credit as Queen Victoria had for her virtue, and he was seeing red.

"Me!" he shouted, "listed in every credit agency in town as a deadbeat! The idea! Look what it does to my credit. Here I've spent a lifetime building up an impeccable credit. I pay my bills on the first of the month, and I never miss taking a discount. If I owe a cent I can't sleep till it's paid. And here I discover, this morning, that my wife has bills at five places, and that they have been running over a year. Think of it! Over a year. And I never heard of one of them till I got a letter from a collection agency at my office! Never heard of them! And they amount to a couple of thousand dollars. I don't mind the money. It's unhandy to have to pay that much, but it's the effect on my credit."

"No woman ever had any idea what a man's credit means," said the other. "No bill ever bothers them until they're pushed to the point where they have to own up they owe it."

Which, if one may say so gently, is one of the worst aspects of the situation. Imagine a man who thinks his credit is A 1. Sometime he wants to use it, and goes to get money at a bank, or to buy a bill of goods for his store—and then discovers he is listed as a deadbeat! Not so good.

Add to this, that women can't buy. They can acquire things by purchase, but they can't buy, in the business sense of the word. A woman is what the bee lights on. She gets stung. The other day I saw an instance of this in one of our finest dress shops. In pursuit of knowledge, I went to this place with a lady, and when I say lady I mean lady. She was a pretty fair buyer, and went to try on a creation which she had bought for one hundred and twenty-five dollars. But then, she's in business herself. In this shop she met a friend who went into what women call raptures over the gown, and wanted to know if enmity would arise if she got one that go on living

Living Gifts

ONCE in a blue moon of Christmases a gift of gifts is placed under the big tree in your home.

That Christmas forever after is remembered as the Christmas when Father or Brother or Bob or Jim got his Hamilton.

For a fine watch like the Hamilton is really a living gift that goes on living. Year after year it ticks confidently away, marking the passage of time with almost uncanny accuracy.

The longer you carry a Hamilton, the more you regard it as something greater than a mere miracle of workmanship. A human meaning — an affection — attaches itself to this gift.

Here is a companion to consult many times every day of your life, a companion ready to serve you with such tireless constancy that you may rely just as surely upon its word as you would upon an old friend's.

Your Hamilton, in fine, is a friend. A living, beautiful friend that will go on living just so long as you gently impart strength to its tiny ticking heart.

Top . . . The "Ramsay" — With Romanesque numerals and octagonal bow combines a dash of modernity with exquisite simplicity. In 14k yellow or white gold, $100, $140, and $160, depending upon movement.

Upper Center . . . The "Piping Rock" — An ultra-modern strap watch. The numerals of gold, set in enamel, are a part of the case — not the dial. Available only in 14k yellow or white gold, with 19-jewel Hamilton movement, $125.

Center . . . The "Brunswick" — Designed with an eye to tomorrow — but not at all ornate. In 14k green or white gold engraved, with dial shown, $117 to $172.

Lower Center . . . The "Cushion" — Beautifully proportioned in line, with a welcome yet simple richness of appearance. In filled or 14k green or white gold, plain or engraved, $50 to $77.

Below . . . The "Hastings" — A watch with individuality — popular among sportsmen. In 14k filled yellow or white gold, and 14k gold, yellow or white, plain or engraved, with radial face, $55 and $85.

Let us send you a copy of the "Timekeeper" an interesting illustrated booklet telling something of the care with which Hamiltons are made. Also our specially attractive Christmas booklet showing a complete line of Hamilton models. Address Hamilton Watch Co., 883 Columbia Ave., Lancaster, Pa., U. S. A.

There's no Gift like a Watch

—nothing used so much, carried so long or consulted so often. And there's a new meaning now in that old Ingersoll Christmas-time message. For good as were the Ingersoll Watches of the past, those of today are very much better.

Better in looks, better in styling, with the same sturdiness and dependability that have made the name Ingersoll famous . . . And there's a gift suitable for every member of the family in the new, complete line.

INGERSOLL WATCH CO., Inc.
New York Chicago San Francisco

just like it, only in another color. Having obtained this permission from my companion, she placed her order. On credit, of course, and John would have to pay. And what would John have to pay? I pause for a reply, and the reply is not one hundred and twenty-five dollars. No; this second lady, being known as a credit buyer and not as a shopper, was charged three hundred dollars for the identical gown for which my companion was paying one hundred and twenty-five dollars cash. Now, try that one over on your piano.

Don't think these nifty clothes shops don't know their husbands and wives. Particularly their wives. I am not so sure the poisonous state of affairs isn't more their fault than it is the fault of the women who go to them. Women love pretty things, and men love pretty women, and women love to be the pretty women men love, and there you are. What price expense if they get the result?

But these shops and even the larger stores, which should be comparatively reputable in their methods, don't care a hang for the poor husband as long as they can get a firm grip on the wife. They will give anybody credit if they look as if they had it. And everybody looks as if she had it nowadays. A woman can get trusted for anything. It is worse than that, she is urged to avail herself of the privilege. She gets letters from firms telling her she can come in and buy on credit. They have opened an account for her without her asking. They shove credit down her throat.

IT IS a well-known fact that the most astute person will buy more if he can defer payment than he will if he has to hand out the actual cash. And shopping women are not astute persons—they are creatures in a frenzy. Which frenzy is added to, multiplied and made more terrible by a race of hypnotic saleswomen and -men who know how to make the right gestures before the eyes of the subject.

Most women go into a store with good intentions. They are going to buy a cheap little dress, or something. Great! This is their day for economy, so they place themselves in the hands of one of these malignant psychological experts, and the expert puts them over the jumps. The woman is worked on, excited, flattered, bedazzled. Mannequins parade, conversation of a skilled kind is indulged in, other women are there, also being hypnotized in this atmosphere of mass hypnosis. With the result that the poor, well-intentioned wife goes perfectly blank, and comes out to discover that, instead of buying a cheap little dress for, maybe, fifty dollars, she had been hocused into obligating her husband to pay for seven hundred and forty-three dollars' worth of goods, wares, and merchandise which she didn't need at all.

So I'm not so sure that the women are to blame. They're not to blame even for being women. They're not to blame for anything, so far as I can see, and should be dealt with accordingly. I mean to say, they should be under some sort of guardianship and protection to save them from themselves and from the basilisk eye of the saleslady with the large bust and the charming manners, and the heart of a crocodile imitating a log at the edge of the $10,000 a year is what I pay Louis George, Illinois. I now need 250 more men who can earn from $6,500 to $10,000 a year in my organization.

I'LL PAY 100 MEN The Same Money I Pay Louis George

STEADY WORK ASSURED at BIG PAY

Our new expansion program calls for an immediate addition of 250 reliable men to fill good money-making territories. Permanent, big pay positions await the successful applicants. No experience necessary—we will give a complete training in Fire Prevention. Our plans make it possible for the men to get started in a business of their own without capital. New, amazing invention replaces old type extinguishers everywhere. Allowance made for old equipment taken in. You can sell equipment on credit; we protect you against losses.

QUICK PROMOTIONS

Our men are given promotion to distributors as soon as they make good. Our organization is known as one of the country's highest paid sales organizations. We give you the training and cooperation that is responsible for this reputation. Every representative furnished with complete profit making plan worked out by experts.

BROAD MARKET

FYR-FYTER has universal acceptance—see list of customers on this page. We have a type of extinguisher to fit every type of hazard. Every school, store, hotel, home, hospital or factory is a prospect.

L. D. Payne, Iowa, earned $4,500 his first 200 days, Viles, Wisconsin, sold $50,000 in one year—many others averaging $6,500 to $10,000 a year. We will show you how to make this income.

stream where children come down to bathe.

There is one store which has discovered that, to do business one does not have to give credit. It has come to be one of the greatest retail stores in the world. And its name is blessed in the eyes of men married to women. You can't get trusted there for a spool of thread. It sells goods for cash only. It does not hypnotize women into buying what they do not want and cannot pay for. The success of this store should be, but isn't, a lesson to the rest. Just one hundred per cent of the nifty dress shops in the country would have to go out of business if they were forbidden to give credit.

And the number of peaceful, happy homes in our fair land would mount by leaps and bounds; divorce courts would have to advertise for business, and something like a financial millennium would come in.

We have heard a lot about relief for farmers and relief for corporations and relief for fishermen and what-not. But when did we hear of any legislative program looking to relief for husbands? The condition of the husband is pathetic. He sits on a keg of powder. He is helpless to get off. My own personal and private notion, which I am trying to make public by this article, is that something should be done about it. Something very, very legal. Instead of bothering about Teapot Dome or the Income Tax or Prohibition, the good and the wicked of this great republic should join hands to start something. They should put on the statute books a reasonable law that no retail merchant, or shoppe psychologist, or other vender of goods, wares, and merchandise could collect for things he sells to a dependent wife, unless he first had in writing the permission of the husband to extend credit to her.

What's unfair about that?

husband John Smith. Now, if John Smith receives a bill from a store in which his credit has been established for some time, he will probably have to pay this outstanding debt before closing his account. But if he—or any other husband—receives a first bill at his office, all he has to do is to send it back to the store it came from, with a notation: "I have no account with you. Possibly this bill is intended for my wife. Her address is thus and so."

And when he goes home, he tells her in the bright lexicon of slang, "exactly where she gets off." Furthermore, this notice from John Smith to the store forces the latter to enter the account in Mrs. Smith's name unsupported by the credit of her husband.

Naturally, the store prefers to have the account stand in the husband's name, whether bills are sent actually to him or to the wife. If the husband declares his unwillingness to assume her liability, an account in her name would be classed as a "watch account." If the wife does not pay with reasonable promptness it is "suspended," meaning that her credit is canceled. In this event she can't "charge it."

In other words, Mrs. John's expenditure would be very quickly checked if John would stiffen his backbone and find out what Mrs. John may be doing with half of his name.

However, if John still feels insecure, surely, with all the measures constantly put through the legislature, he can get James and Tom and any number of Dicks and Harrys to take a little interest in protecting their credit, and have a law passed making wives responsible for their own indebtedness. Apparently it has not occurred to this poor, pathetic husband, created by Kelland, that a woman of today is a perfectly responsible, voting, and office-holding citizen. Why this fetish dragged from the Ark, that she be considered an irresponsible chattel?

The above advice as to "how to get out from under," is offered to husbands mostly as an emergency relief, although the insistence that a woman be held responsible for her own debts is one of the basic necessities of domestic solvency. A few of the other basic necessities are these:

A wife must know exactly how much she may spend. No woman should be held financially responsible unless she knows what her responsibilities are. Either she must receive a fixed allowance or, receiving no allowance, she must then be made a full business partner, and share in the decision and in the responsibility of what she and her husband spend jointly. The real cause of John Smith's financial situation—which has, of course, no more to do with the accidental factor of charging a few dresses, or anything else—is that a certain type of husband (the "100 per cent he-man type" especially) treats his wife as though she were a moron. Sometimes she is; but so, sometimes, is he. Seldom does he treat her (train her, if you prefer) as a partner capable of reasonable intelligence and loyalty.

I OFTEN wonder what is at the bottom of this treatment. Does the husband fear that discovery of momentary failure to keep always on the crest may belittle him in his wife's eyes? Is there distrust of her loyalty because she chose to cast her lot with his? And, after having picked her from many women, does he have so much contempt for her intelligence that he thinks her incapable of understanding domestic finance?

Of course, if a man marries a heartless gold-digger or a congenital imbecile he has to pay for his mistake—just as he pays for any other mistake he makes. But I would like to ask two questions of John Smith:

"How honest are you with your wife? How far do you go in telling her the truth about your affairs?"

I have an idea Mr. Kelland himself might be surprised at the evasion of the answers. And then, if I can persuade Mr. Kelland himself to ask each one of his villainously squandering female clients, relatives, and neighbors, "How much do you know about your husband's business? Have you any definite knowledge of what he can, or cannot afford?" I believe he might learn a thing or two to his advantage.

I doubt if more than one wife in ninety has the least idea—based on knowledge—whether her husband is amassing a fortune or whether he is on the verge of bankruptcy. It would be very interesting to have him find out whether the typical wife who "charges it to John" has any definite way of knowing that what she charges is out of proportion to John's income, or whether she has reason to suppose that John has plenty of money, and simply wants her to behave as if he had much less?

I AM not attempting to deny that money does quite frequently cause trouble between husband and wife, and that such scenes occur as those reported by Mr. Kelland. But I do contend that the money difficulty in family life is chiefly the fault of the husband, who, for reasons known only to himself and the Almighty, tells his wife nothing whatever, or as little as possible, about what he is doing, or trying to do, or failing to do.

In the dependent situation of sending her bills to his office—what can a wife do but guess by what her husband says and does, how much they may be, or how small they must be? How is she supposed to decide whether she may, or may not, do the house over, take the children to the seashore, buy a new carpet, or whatever she has in mind to embellish or beautify her home, her children, or herself?

How many men think it good business policy to appear prosperous? (It is an entirely logical policy, and I am not against it.) But if it is "appearance" rather than actual prosperity, the wife should be told the precise degree of this attitude and its object. Naturally, if a wife is kept in total ignorance of her husband's affairs, she takes it for granted that if John can afford a five-thousand-dollar automobile, she certainly should be able to get herself and the children smart clothes to wear in it!

In answer to the heart-rending sadness of Mr. Kelland's description of poor shorn-lamb husband in "little old last year's pants," while wife decked herself in a brand-new "creation of shell-pink," one might suggest that plenty of wives—not typical perhaps, but numerous enough to make a very telling percentage—are wearing much farther back than last year's clothes, and worrying themselves to death about every expenditure, even necessities for the children's well-being, when up drives husband in his expensive new car, clothed according to fashion's best and latest. Of course there are penurious wives— But more often than not they are the thrifty little partners, trying their best to keep the firm solvent despite whatever form of expenditure happens to be the policy—or weakness—of their men!

I have had long talks recently, with credit managers, department heads, and salesmen in the great dry-goods stores as well as the "specialty shops," in New York. And I present it, not merely as my own opinion, but as a well-known fact, that the reckless and unintelligent buyers are not women but men. Every expert retail salesman (or saleswoman) knows that he can sell almost anything to the average man, but that the average woman insists on getting the best possible commodity for her money.

The great shopping districts of America, I discovered, are supported almost entirely by women. From seventy to ninety per cent of retail charge-account bills are paid with checks signed by women, and thousands upon thousands of women are independently rated "A 1."

Of course there are certain individual women who resort to finesse and petty chicaneries in order to obtain credit; there are others who are unreasonably insistent and persistent in their demands, but usually they are married to men of the type of John Smith. And apparently all that the John Smiths can do, judging from Mr. Kelland's article, is to air their grievances in public, not having the patience to train their wives in private.

As an example of what I mean by "training," I might as well cite my own, which began almost as far back as I can remember. I opened my first "charge account" at the age of four, when I ran up a bill amounting to five dollars for marshmallows and gumdrops at Sproul's, in Bar Harbor.

MY TRAINING was begun promptly by my father, who refused to pay the bill. It was mine, he told me, not his. I couldn't add, so my father filled a box with five hundred beans. I could understand each bean meant a penny of this terrible debt, which I was made to pay week after week out of an allowance. In other words, instead of being forbidden to "charge it," I was held responsible. For years I struggled with the impulse to charge and the knowledge that I must stay free of debt, or wear the collar of a slave around my neck. This last was nothing but a thin gold chain, but I was made to feel it such a badge of shame that to this day a gold necklace has a far from beautifying association.

Another child I knew had a sheet of wrapping papers on which was wax-penciled each item of her indebtedness, fastened first over her crib and then over her bed for years! But to have stopped her credit—what lesson would that have taught? As it was, she is now so bill-shy that she cannot endure a bill unpaid by return mail. A perfect instance of behavior "conditioning" since she, too, was a born spendthrift.

By which I do not propose that a husband train his wife as though she were a child of four, though the emphasis on her responsibility, instead of on the retail credit system, is the same.

Charge accounts are quite as much a convenience as forks to eat with, or any other convenience of civilization. Furthermore, it must be conceded that well-rated charge accounts frequently serve as the only available proof of credit. A friend of mine—one of those not unheard-of widows who had to sell her belongings to pay her husband's debts—took a clerical position and closed every charge account. At the end of five years she had an opportunity to establish herself in business—and found she had no credit. She told me she was handicapped for years, and in some instances was never able completely to restore the weakness of her "suspended credit."

In New York (and in other cities, I suppose) there is a huge book with the name of all retail charge customers, and their ratings. And I know that in many instances wives and husbands are rated separately. So again I ask why are none of the extravagant or predatory wives Mr. Kelland writes of "put on their own"?

The one argument I have to offer against charge accounts is that people rarely realize the leaps and bounds with which a few items run up to an important total. But it is easy enough to write down amounts as you charge them, and in this way keep tabs on the size of your bill.

How people charge bills and evade payment I've never had satisfactorily explained. The only business houses that I've heard of who allow charge accounts to run on unpaid for years are haberdashers and tailors for men!

Mr. Kelland's assumption that our grandparents led lives of primitive privations finds no echo in my own experience. If he said "modern pruning of all but essentials," it would sound truer to me, since the farther back many of us remember, the greater the ease and distinction. It is true that today we earn more; but that "more" just about stretches over necessities that outgrow their bounds yearly. Everywhere, big houses are being sold for business and their gardens cut up for building lots, because the cost of space and upkeep has become prohibitive.

On the other hand, it is true that millions of us can afford "modern conveniences," including such luxuries as electricity, plumbing, steam heat, radios, and automobiles. It is true that a thousand-dollar car seems to be within reach of all of us, where a thousand-dollar horse was once the rare expenditure of the few. But only a few among the once many can afford comfortably equipped houses of hospitable size. And the diminished household, even though it contain a chauffeur or butler or both and answers very well for today's company for cards or meals, is hardly comparable with that which once took care of innumerable guests who stayed for weeks at a time. No; it seems to me that the new art of furnishing with emptiness is a gesture of necessity. It also seems to me that the minimum is here!

Mind you, I don't think it has hurt anyone a bit to come down from big establishments run according to time-taking formalities that would drive us of hurried today to distraction! But it is an undeniable fact that never has the domestic problem of how to fit expenditure into income been greater. The only way to solve it at all is by frank and thoughtful discussion between the husband and his domestic partner, the wife.

THERE is no possible doubt of the basic fact that marriage, today more than ever, must be a partnership. And what sort of partnership can exist where one of the members has not the least idea whether the business is running at immense profit, or total loss; where not one detail is discussed, where no judgment is asked, where no say in any decision is permitted? Every day, certain men in seemingly modest circumstances die, leaving their widows in utterly untrained control of millions; while others, who have sheltered their wives behind every protecting luxury, leave them to the equally unprepared necessity of earning their daily bread. I can name a number of the first, and a score of the latter, among my personal friends. And I confess that the latter have achieved a distinctly better average of success than the first.

The woman unprepared for great wealth, either by training or inheritance, seems inclined to turn hard—and sometimes yellow, like the gold that has made her so.

But with the new rich this article has really nothing to do. The new poor are, however, most important in adding another point in evidence of the stupidity of Mr. Kelland's husband. Among my personal acquaintances and friends I can name twenty-two women who had lived from thirty to fifty years without the vaguest preparation for money-making—not one among the entire twenty-two has failed to provide for herself and, where necessary, her dependents. How plentifully or how meagerly is not the point. The point is that, if one hundred per cent of purely hothouse-bred women have been perfectly capable of learning how to do the bill-paying alone and unaided, it is not unreasonable to suppose them intelligent enough to have been deserving of a somewhat higher rating than their husbands, if patterned by Mr. Kelland, would have been capable of granting them.

HIS suggestion that women be "under guardianship" or "protection" is too medieval even to answer. Wives must know more, not less, before charge accounts cease to make poor helpless husbands unhappy.

Moreover, whether she is spending money that is house allowance, clothes allowance, or money of her own, every woman should be trained from childhood not only in financial responsibility but in knowledge of values in buying. In this day things are too expensive to buy unknowingly. A woman who has made a study of values, whether as a professional buyer, or merely as one who buys very moderately for her own home, is not going to be led astray by any basilisk saleslady, though she have the persuasiveness of the original serpent in the Garden of Eden.

Woman-of-knowledge asks, "How much?" Saleslady cooes, "Only three hundred dollars—it cost us four to get it out of the Customs House!" Or, "It is a genuine antique from the Overseas collection." Woman-of-knowledge makes a calculation: "Quality, medium; Style, fair; Cut, American. Made down-town—value about $39.50." Or "Joinings, modern; Wood, new; worth $50 at most." Tempted? Not in the least.

A MARVELOUS SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE is related next month by Honoré Willsie Morrow, editor and novelist. "The Strangest Adventure a Woman Ever Had" is the title of her article. But it is more than a strange adventure: it is the story of a soul seeking the answer to a question which we all ask of ourselves as we go through life. And out in the great American desert Mrs. Morrow found her answer. This article will give you a great spiritual lift.

The Trail Eater

was making his exit, not in the slinking manner of a whipped cur, but in morose thoughtfulness, his brush hanging straight. As if suddenly becoming aware of Herrington's regard, he paused and deliberately looked back over his shoulder.

For a long, strange moment the two measured each other. Behind the bars of the muzzle the wolf-dog's eyes burned with an almost human hate.

The morning after the supper, Kerry rose after a few hours' sleep and, finding that his head was not as clear as it should be, he dressed and left his close cabin for the frosty sunshine out of doors. With half a dozen of his favorite dogs at heel he set out for a brisk walk down the coast.

On a four-mile jaunt his dullness vanished, and was replaced by a tingling energy, an exhilarating awareness of his own bodily vigor. His feet in native mukluks swung lightly over the hard-packed winter trail; the fallen hood of his reindeer parka lay about his throat like a ruff, its light fur accentuating the healthy tan of his face.

There was little in his appearance today to connect him with the pale stripling of twenty-three who had landed in Nome three years before—the Kerry Wayne whom the town, with rough pity, had dubbed a "lunger," because of his thin, rather stooping shoulders, and the slight cough he always tried to mask with laughter.

Those men who liked to preface their remarks with "I knew him when" remembered how Kerry, with a small patrimony, and big Rance Herrington, with not a dime in his corduroys, had arrived together and, continuing a friendship begun as cabin mates on the steamer, had batched in a tent on the beach; how Kerry had finally invested his small capital in the building that housed Nome's daily paper, and, after furnishing an upstairs room for the optimistic but impecunious Herrington, had slipped away to the high country back of the Range with Doorknob Balsh as guide, and Duna, a bright-eyed, roly-poly pup, riding the old man's pack.

AFTER Kerry had gone, the seesaw of fortune on which he had hitherto been the higher financial figure began slowly to swing. The Third Beach was struck, and Rance Herrington staked the Gray Wolf mine. Kerry, returning after a year's health-seeking, found empty the little room above the noisy press of the "Prospector." Herrington, in the idiom of the North, was "in the coarse money."

Kerry was poorer financially than when he landed; but his cough was gone, and the outdoor life that had straightened his shoulders and deepened his chest had also given him abundant vitality, which was thoroughly taxed by the four-day celebration the exuberant Herrington arranged in his honor.

Kerry found his friend lavishly scattering his new-found gold. High-handed, generous, and patronizing, Herrington took it for granted that Kerry would make his home at the luxurious Herrington apartment and accept the easy position awaiting him at the Gray Wolf. When the younger man, valuing his independence and freedom, quietly settled himself in a cabin out on the tundra and began reading borrowed law books and doctoring outcast dogs, the gold king's scorn knew no bounds.

It was months before Rance's thwarted generosity vented itself in verbal explosions and exasperated, affectionate oaths. When it came to money, he was always ready to share what he had with anyone; but he had other traits which made Kerry vaguely uneasy about him.

This morning, as he turned his steps homeward, he was recalling how Rance always rode roughshod toward the thing he wanted. It had been that way last night when he had brought the outlaw husky racer to the supper. The incident had left an unpleasant impression on Kerry, yet, despite it, all the morning he had been aware of another and quite opposite sensation, an underlying consciousness of a newness to life, a faint, youthful sense of expectancy, the reason for which had not yet occurred to him. Now, all at once he remembered—Barbee Neilan!

He swung along, wondering about this. . . . Twenty-four hours ago he had not known her; but now the mere fact of her presence there in the town ahead of him added an indefinable glamour to his world. His stride quickened. He had an absurdly happy feeling that he was looking at the country with a new vision. For the first time in his twenty-six years he felt a desire to share beauty with a woman—with Barbee Neilan.

KERRY was almost home again when far up the road a bright splash of color showed in the traffic. As it came nearer, it revealed itself a vermilion-painted tank mounted on a sled drawn by a team of gray truck-horses as shaggy in their winter coat of hair as Shetland ponies. From the back of the tank projected a faucet, which was kept from freezing by the charcoal stove attached beneath it.

On each side in white letters two feet high it bore the legend H_2O—Nome's terse way of announcing the presence of its winter water carriers. On top of the tank a small man in a drab fur parka sat beside a little Scotch terrier that resembled a very dirty chrysanthemum. Between these two was that intangible and comical likeness which often exists between master and dog.

Both contributed to the general jingle, for the dog's collar was ringed with silver bells, and the man had one dangling from the top of his fur cap. Yet, despite the gay circus-like appearance of the outfit, more lugubrious countenances never adorned man or beast.

"Hey, Lim! Going to run me down?" Kerry's laughing shout roused the meditating Phelim. As he brought his horses to a halt in the vapor of their own breath his long upper lip flattened in a smile that crept to the hazel of his sad, bovine eyes.

"Well—now! If it ain't Kerry—" He reached down to shake hands, while the diminutive Crooger thumped a welcoming tail. "Man dear, I'm glad to see you back wid us! Me an' Doorknob an' the pups has missed you. . . . But what have we here?" He cocked an eye and pointed a scornful, incredulous finger at Kerry's dogs frisking about in the snow. "Sure, thim's not the fine string of trail eaters you wiz writin' Doorknob about?"

"Those are them!" said Kerry with ungrammatical emphasis. "Knock the icicles off your lashes and take a good squint at them, Lim. . . . Here, Buster, Mukluk, Tong! Come a-running, Karluk! They're the thirteenth entry, Lim; and I'm telling you Duna's going to clean up the Sweepstakes with them!"

LIM gloomed down at the clumsy, happy band of new dogs, all rangy cross-bred malamutes showing traces of setter, hound, and what-not. "By the H-o-l-y P-o-k-e-r!" His voice was hoarse with disappointment. "Why, man dear, they're a worse bunch of siwashes than you ran last year—an' you payin' good money for 'em, too, belike! All of Nome will be after laughin' at you again, me boy. An' Rance Herrington—sure, he'll have a word to say whin he claps an eye on this bunch!"

"I expect as much—the old Crœsus!" There was a fraternal warmth in the younger man's tones. "He told me last night he wanted to see me about my dogs. I'm going to run up there now to find out just how the boy's been conducting himself during my absence."

"Him—conductin' himself!" Lim Phayden snorted. "An' how would he be conductin' himself wid Luce Barton, the lazy, leather-eared thafe, livin' wid him, hatchin' out schemes, an' the Gray Wolf rollin' the gold in on him faster 'n he can spind it wid his two hands? But that's not all. Yeste'day"—the Irishman leaned down, his voice sinking confidentially—"yeste'day, whin I'm deliverin' wather at Doc Kramer's, what does I see through the windy but Rance and the mistress—"

"Oh—shut—up, Lim! Cut the back-door gossip!" Kerry laughed indulgently, even as he was feeling a vague disquiet. So Luce Barton was occupying that spare room in Rance's apartment, the room Herrington had so often urged upon Kerry himself. . . . "Why, you blessed old bounder!"—he brought himself back to the affairs of the moment—"how are you and Bacchus making out these days?"

Everyone in Nome took a keen interest in Lim's wrestling with his periodic desire for sprees, and Lim was not a little proud of this interest. There was a tinge of gloomy satisfaction in his eye as he sorrowfully made reply: "Not so good, Kerry. Not so good, me boy. I wiz tellin' Crooger last night that the cravin' is comin' on me again. I feel it in me bones, so I do."

Kerry, who had often served as a prop to Lim's failing resolution, lingered to speak a few words of encouragement, then, whistling his dogs to heel once more, went on his way.

On the road Kerry met other men who

WHAT SHOES would this man wear with a business suit LIKE YOURS?

FORMAL SHOES LOOK BEST with formal dress. Certainly there can be no exception to this rigid rule of etiquette: strictly "formal dress," plain-toe footwear of black (preferably patent leather) should be worn with tuxedo or full evening dress.

PLAIN-PATTERN SHOES LOOK BEST with conservative clothing. Shoes of any smooth-finish leather (black or tans) look best with smooth-finish fabrics. Do not wear heavy shoes of "doggy" design with suits of thin, fine-textured weave.

BLACK SHOES LOOK BEST with dark clothing, with blues and all but the lighter shades of gray. The lighter weights are best for summer time, and the heavier shoes for wet and wintry weather. Wear black shoes always in the evening.

The gist of the whole matter is this: the best shoes for any man are those various TYPES of shoes that go best with the clothes HE wears and the things HE does.

It's easy to apply this broad principle to your own case. Consider the six national axioms of good usage in footwear illustrated on this page. How simple, how sensible and reasonable they are! These are by no means new "style recommendations"... merely new statements of long-established customs current in every community among leaders who dress as well as they do their work.

Follow your own personal whims as to patterns, brands and prices but always wear shoes of a TYPE appropriate to the rest of your apparel, if you would be known as one of those men who "wears his clothes well."

Remember these suggestions next time you dress... next time you go to buy shoes. Ask your shoe dealer or write to us for a copy of How Well Dressed Men Get That Way, an illustrated booklet of tips on the knack of getting the utmost in dress-value and satisfaction out of your own footwear.

THIS bulletin is authoritative... one of a series based upon a national study of current customs among well dressed men. It is sponsored by the combined Shoe, Leather and Allied Industries in co-operation with the National Shoe Retailers Association. Executive Advertising Committee, 14th Floor, 260 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

TAN SHOES LOOK BEST with trousers of the lighter shades, with all the browns, and in daylight. For reasons of style, common sense, and comfort the heavier weights come into vogue with the felt hats and heavier suits of autumn.

FANCY-PATTERN SHOES LOOK BEST with woolly fabrics. Brogues and other standard fancy patterns go well with heavy suits, heavy weather or high old times in the open air. Novelty patterns go best with youthful togs and young ideas.

SPORT SHOES LOOK BEST with clothing comfortable and appropriate for out-of-the-city recreation. For general playtime wear men are offered almost unlimited range in their choice of special footwear that's smart and practical.

SHOE merchants who display this emblem are leaders. You may depend upon them always for honest values, up-to-date business methods, authentic styles and modern craftsmanship in shoemaking. Consult them for correct dress in footwear as well as for correct fitting.

REVEALED . . . BY YOUR MIRROR

Dental arches (teeth and gums) differ. Each requires a different type of tooth brush to win gloriously white teeth, coral-firm gums. Read below how easy it is to let your mirror tell your type, to know exactly what kind of brush is best for you to use.

1—Tufted Pro-phy-lac-tic. Most dental arches are full-formed and require this type of brush.

2—Oval Pro-phy-lac-tic. Scientifically designed for small, more sharply oval arch.

3—Masso Pro-phy-lac-tic. For dental arch that has tender gums. Massages as it cleans.

Give your teeth this one chance

Choose and use the Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush that is specifically designed for your dental arch

THANKS to the help and advice of the dental profession, Pro-phy-lac-tic now presents three new and distinctly different types of tooth brushes. All have won the hearty approval of leaders in the movement for greater care of teeth and gums.

To choose the right brush for yourself, simply spend ten seconds with your mirror. Decide what type of dental arch (teeth and gums) you have. Then choose and use the Pro-phy-lac-tic that is scientifically designed to bring your type the good health that is rightfully yours.

It's easy. If your mirror shows a dental arch of normal size as shown by a full-formed face and mouth — the brush for you is the new Tufted Pro-phy-lac-tic.

But if your mirror reveals a small facial contour, your dental arch, too, is small, more oval in shape. Then the Oval Pro-phy-lac-tic is the right brush for you.

Now look again. Examine your gums carefully. If they are pale and lifeless-looking, you need the new Masso Pro-phy-lac-tic. This brush massages as it cleans. It suits both large or small dental arches that require special care.

In a few weeks—the difference

Use your new Pro-phy-lac-tic for a few weeks. Then look into your mirror again . . . if you want to see how much the right Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush can do to give you whiter, sounder teeth—firmer, healthier gums.

greeted him with varying degrees of intimacy. Each one displayed a lively interest in the dogs he had brought back for the Sweepstakes; but since Nome believed in racing only thoroughbred malamutes or huskies, invariably each one echoed Lim Phayden's opinion of them. And after they had passed Kerry, the Nomeites discussed him.

IT WAS characteristic of the Trail Eater, they agreed, that he should be out romping with his dogs on his first morning in town instead of sampling the pleasures that awaited along Front Street for a man who had been prospecting all summer beyond the Range.

His return had already set Nome a-buzzing with anecdotes of the young fellow who talked to his dogs as if they were reasoning creatures, and who played his old banjo and sang to them of nights in that deep, lazy voice of his; of the young man who cared for every mangy, homeless malamute in the country, and who would part with his last dollar to buy any animal he found being ill-treated. Even in dog-loving Nome he was considered gullible, and many a crafty Eskimo had obtained a good price for a worthless cur by beating it when Kerry was near.

In an old frame barn on the tundra back of town he had, nearly two years before, fitted up a home for his charges and installed Doorknob Balsh as caretaker. He called his headquarters the Kashim, but Nome laughingly dubbed it the Poor-House. Derelicts, human or canine, always found a welcome there, and Kerry maintained that it was a self-supporting institution, since Doorknob did sufficient freighting with the strongest dogs to earn their food—walrus and whale meat purchased from the Eskimos.

The year previous, when the rich members of the Malamute Club had bought up the best dogs and drivers in the country to train them for the Sweepstakes, Nome had been more than ever amused at Kerry Wayne. Against the pick of the North he had audaciously entered a team—and every dog in it, with the exception of his leader, Duna, was an outcast from the Kashim!

On the morning of the great contest Kerry drove up to the starting post with easy confidence, his blue and gold colors fluttering bravely from the collar of Duna in the lead. But, despite the dashing manner of his arrival, the string of scrub dogs he lined up contrasted almost ludicrously with the strong, lithe racing teams of Rance Herrington and the other gold kings.

Believing him to be a clown or a fool, Nome laughed and hooted. Don Quixote some of them called him; others in derision dubbed him the Trail Eater. But he answered all their gibes with witty good nature.

Underneath its mocking mirth, however, Nome was puzzled and a trifle suspicious. The wary bookmaker who kept the betting board at the Golden Sands Saloon came to scrutinize Kerry again as he stood waiting; then, reassured by the sorry-looking team, he returned to his board and offered odds of ten to one that Kerry Wayne would never get a hundred miles from town.

For a time it looked as if the bookmaker's judgment might be right. Kerry got away to a bad start, owing to a slight blizzard that was making. In addition, several hours later, when he unhitched Duna to readjust his collar, the remainder of the team broke away and, turning, ran with the wind back to town.

No bets were collected, because Kerry followed the culprits and, instead of giving up the race, hitched Duna once more in the lead of the runaways and calmly made a new start!

That first day he covered only ten miles, while the slowest of the other entries made sixty. The next day reports of his progress came in over the telephone from various stations along the way. To the surprise of all, he was keeping to the Trail in a growing blizzard that was trying the mettle of the strongest.

Later on, three other drivers, snow-blind and out of their heads with fatigue, quit the race at the village of Candle; but Nome learned with astonishment that Kerry and his team of gallant mongrels, though fully a hundred miles behind, were battling onward.

Slim Carvey, driving Herrington's victorious Siberian malamutes on the return trip, met Kerry, still outward bound and as cheerful as if he himself had been leading on the home stretch. He was resting in a tent; but he took his battered dogs from the shelter and insisted on Slim's tired team going in to rest, while he cooked lunch for his successful competitor.

Then he kept going!

Nome had not yet ceased to wonder how he urged his derelict team over that heartbreaking two hundred miles to Candle, where the racers turned to go back to Nome; yet he did it. Half of his dogs were exhausted, and others frozen in the flanks, so he attempted no immediate return. But after resting a day, he borrowed a gun and nonchalantly took his team off for a holiday caribou hunting!

Nome was still speculating about that move, for the sequel came three weeks after the Sweepstakes was over, when Kerry drove up to the Nome finishing post, and laughingly sent word to the judges that the Trail Eater wanted to check in!

He knew how to take a joke on himself, did Kerry Wayne, and the town joined him in his laughing; but those veteran sportsmen who talked him over in the seclusion of the Dog Room in the Golden Sands were more than ever puzzled—and suspicious.

FULLY aware of the comment he and his new dogs were creating, Kerry took his way through the town toward the corner where Nome's finest business block stood resplendent in the sun. The black and silver sign of the Arctic Bank and Trust Company surmounted the Roman arch of the entrance; a flag pole towered on its glittering roof; a cornice with fluted supports projected all the way round the top. The entire structure, which at first glance appeared to be of gray stone, was really covered with galvanized iron pressed into cunning imitation of granite blocks. The building had a second story, given over to the luxurious apartments of Midas Bernard, Rance Herrington, and other gold kings.

HOW MUCH LIFE INSURANCE DOES A MAN REALLY NEED?

FUNNY thing about the life insurance dollar. Most men seem to give it some sort of supernatural purchasing power that the ordinary dollar does not possess. And usually it is left for the dependents of a man to discover, after he has gone, the cold, hard truth that one hundred cents in life insurance won't purchase any more of the necessities of life than any other kind of a dollar.

Base life insurance protection for your family, not on some arbitrary figure that SOUNDS big, but upon an amount of insurance which, when put to work, will furnish a comfortable monthly income for those dear to you.

The Provident has published a brochure, "Your Income and Your Life Insurance", which shows the relationship that should exist between income and life insurance for the average man in his income group.

and ran up the steps to his friend's quarters. He was admitted by an Eskimo in a white duck jacket that incongruously topped a pair of sturdy mukluked legs.

"Hello, Amatook! It's good to find you still on the old job! Where's the boss?"

The Eskimo's brown, good-natured face broadened in a smile that lighted his slant eyes with welcome. He chuckled: "Lance? He p-l-e-n-t-y lazy again today!" Amatook was a genuine democrat, who had cast aside his whaling spear to become the major-domo of Herrington's ménage. With delighted grimaces he indicated the door across the hall:

"He plenty, plenty lazy all time, Kerry. You go ketch-um!"

Kerry crossed the threshold. The room was warm and dim and quiet except for the sibilance of escaping steam in a corner radiator and the distant prolonged whistle of the Electric Light Plant announcing the hour of noon.

Against one wall, on a polar-bear skin, stood an ornate brass bed with a white fox robe thrown over the foot; and in the middle of this a huddle of satin and linen both outlined and concealed the body of a sleeper.

KERRY stood a moment, wrinkling his nose at the faint staleness of liquor in the air; then:

"Wake up, precious!" he piped in an absurd falsetto, as he flung his cap at a dent in the pillows. "Wake up, sweet thing!"

There was a groan as two long arms shot out of the heap of amber satin.

"What 'n— Oh, it's you!" Herrington got his sleep-sodden eyes open, and roared a welcome as he laid hold of the younger man and shook him. "Lord, Kerry, I'm glad to see you! Didn't have a chance to talk to you last night. Sit down while I scramble into something."

He yawned mightily, swung his feet to the rug, and sat wavering, his palms pressed to his temples. With one foot he was reaching around under the bed for his fur-lined slippers. "Here, Am! Get me my slippers. Darn it—can't stoop over this morning a-tall. Dizzy. Gullet like a furnace too." He thrust out his chin and tenderly stroked his throat. "Must have gone the limit at the supper last night."

"It wasn't what you drank at the supper that made you blotto—though I'll say you took plenty. It was afterward. When I left you at four this morning you were buying 'alamand lefts' and champagne down at the Golden Sands!"

Herrington wrinkled his brow in momentary consideration of this information. "H'm, that's right! And you, you piker, deserted me just after Luce came in. By the way, Kerr, what's the matter with you and Luce? You acted as friendly as two strange malamutes last night." Without waiting for a reply, he continued: "Now, Luce isn't a bad fellow when you get to know him. Smart as they make 'em, too. You'll change your mind about him when you hear about the proposition I've declared you in on, Kerr. Luce has fixed it up—the finest little racing combine that was ever organized in Nome!"

Animated into forgetfulness of his throbbing head, Herrington got up and began pacing the floor. "Thirty thousand dollars in prizes! Think of that! And the betting, s-ay!" he made an expressive gesture. "If signs mean anything there'll be all of two hundred thousand change hands when the winner comes home! We are— But wait! I'll tell you the whole scheme while we eat."

Ten minutes later the two were facing each other over the table set at one end of Herrington's long living-room.

"It's a sure thing, Kerr! Luce and I have formed a sort of racing syndicate, and I want you in on it. We've got three teams already, and you're to put in the other—Duna, of course, and those new dogs you brought back. Heaven grant that they're better than those scrubs you have at the Kashim!" he interposed fervently. "Slim has already started to train our dogs. He'll drive a team in the race certainly; but the important thing is this, Kerry"—he tapped the table with his fork—"Slim can do things with pups; but you, darn you, have got a way that makes pups fall over themselves to do things for you! You got results even with those curios you picked up last year!

"Now, I figure that with you and Slim working together to condition the best dogs we can buy, one of our four teams is bound to win first money. Possibly another will come in for second, or third. Of course we don't want to hog everything. But it's in the betting we'll clean up! We've got sharpshooters and railbirds on the job already. Before April we'll have a line on the speed of every dog our competitors have, and we'll know which one of our own teams to back for a winner.

"But—now just a minute—" as Kerry tried for the third time to interrupt him—"you, my boy, are to get five hundred dollars a month while you're training the pups, ten per cent of the winnings on the books, and, in addition to that, we'll split any purse we win three ways. How's that for square?"

KERRY did not speak at once. It was not until he saw Rance's look darken into disappointment and suspicion that he reached across and laid a tanned, muscular hand over the other's white one.

"That's darned decent of you, Rance, figuring me in on this. And that five hundred a month looks like a million to me in the present state of my finances; but"—he hesitated the fraction of a second, then finished firmly—"you'll have to count me out this time. I'm going up against the Trail with my own dogs, old man."

"The thunder you are!" flashed Herrington. "Do you mean to say you're turning me down?"

"Keep your seat, Rance. There's no need to get all boiled up about this. I appreciate what you've done—or tried to do for me. You know that. But—well, I've reasons for wanting to go into this race absolutely on my own."

"On your own, eh?" Herrington's face cleared. "That's different. For a moment I thought someone else had roped you into an agreement of some kind. But, look here, Kerr!" He rushed into argument. "You're throwing away a sure stake. You won't stand a chance against the Syndicate. Why, for the last six months we've been combing Alaska and Siberia for dogs. We're in about fifteen thousand dollars already; but we own the pick of the country.

"Not only that, we've grabbed up everything else in harness that showed the least bit of promise, to keep them away from other entrants. Now, you listen to me—it takes money to go into this thing. Have you got it? I'll say you haven't! The only thing you have to put up is that flock of cripples at the Kashim and those new dogs you brought back with you. Oh, yes—there's Duna. I admit we have nothing in the way of a leader that can touch him. But one pup doesn't make a team any more than one swallow makes a drink. No, no, Kerr! You can't win! And—confound it, you blundering old Trail Eater, I—I think too much of you to see you make a laughingstock of yourself again this year."

Herrington's dark eyes softened with the look of friendship Kerry had not seen there since their first sanguine, happy-go-lucky days of poverty together. Emotionally deepened by months of solitude, he was touched; more than that, he was nearly betrayed into telling Herrington the truth about his racing—the truth he had so successfully hidden.

"YOU don't understand, Rance. It isn't exactly a case of win or lose with me—it's more than that. It's—"

While he faltered irresolute, Amatook poked his head in the doorway and grinned knowingly.

"Miss Barbee—she 'phome over!" he barked; and disappeared.

When Herrington rose and followed the Eskimo out to the telephone, Kerry sighed in sudden relief. He couldn't, after all, put the thing into words, this vague, tormenting thing that had lived in his heart since the last Sweeptstakes—this fear that he might prove a quitter on the Trail.

Had he a yellow streak in him—or had he not? Once again his mind went back to that first time he had suspected himself. It had happened soon after he landed in Nome, while he and Rance were still batching together on the Beach. He had not dreamed he had anything wrong with his lungs, not until the day he sought a remedy for a cold, and the army doctor told him. . . .

At first the verdict left him numb and uncomprehending. He trudged back from the Fort along the heavy sandy beach like one in a dream. But later, when he was all alone in the little tent—

He winced, remembering how he had gone to pieces. . . . If he hadn't a yellow streak in him, would he have gone down under the blow in such a way? By a spiritual effort so great it nauseated him, he managed to be sitting plucking the strings of his banjo outside the tent when Rance came home. It was Rance's turn to cook supper that day. Kerry waited until he was stirring up the batter for a bannock. . . .

"Well, Rance, the old sawbones down at the Fort says I'll have to leave the coast and beat it for the high country. Got a little touch of—" He hadn't been able to say the word, so he tapped his chest and then immediately twanged some chords, queer discordant things they must have been; but they helped him to a surface nonchalance. Rance never suspected that he was afraid.

They've Found a Drugless Way to Instant Sleep!

A Way Doctors the World Over are Advising—for New Youth, New Energy, Fewer "Nerves" Tomorrow

"Working under severe mental strain, I was unable to sleep well at night—felt 'dragged out' daytimes. Since taking Ovaltine, I sleep like a top at night and am full of pep every day." William Lally, Jr., Miami, Fla.

Please Accept 3-Day Test of This Unique Swiss Discovery That Millions Now are Using

FOR years people hoped for a drugless way of inducing sleep. A way that would bring sleep quickly when they went to bed . . . sleep without drugs, without enervating soporifics.

Today there is a way as free of drugs as the bread you eat or the milk you drink. A way that does even more than induce sleep. That re-builds your depleted tissues while you sleep. That gives you boundless new vitality the next day.

Largely on medical advice, people are flocking to its use. For a 3-day test, just use the coupon below.

Not a Medicine

It is called Ovaltine. A delicious food-drink. The discovery of a world-noted Swiss scientist. You take it at bed time. And soon you fall asleep.

Next morning you wake up feeling like a new person: For the peculiar dietetic property of Ovaltine re-supplies your system during the night with the energy lost the previous, active day. Builds you up and rejuvenates you.

Over 20,000 doctors are advising it. Its use has spread over some 50 different nations. New to America, it has been used over 30 years in Europe.

Acts This Way

Ovaltine acts on entirely different principles from sleep producing drugs. Remember, it's not a medicine. It contains no drugs. It's a food.

Thus, you can take it night after night and not only avoid a habit, as with drugs, but build up your health as well.

Instead of drugging your nerves to sleep, it acts to soothe you to sleep. For it corrects the digestive unrest to which most sleeplessness now is traced.

It marks one of the most important scientific findings of its time. And must not be confused with "Malt" or "Chocolate" preparations which may claim the same effects or taste like it. It is widely different in formula and result.

Doctors advise it not only for sleeplessness, but for nerve-strain, malnutrition, general run down conditions, for nervous, underweight children, for nursing mothers, and the aged. Thousands take it to relieve fatigue during the day.

Mail for 3-Day Test

Please accept the 3-day test below. Note how quickly sleep comes. Mark how great your next day's energy. Mark the difference in your whole appearance.

Mail the coupon. Or obtain in regular size package at drug or grocery store. Also served at soda fountains.

OVALTINE

BUILDS BODY, BRAIN AND NERVES

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

In all the black days following, Rance meant a lot to him—his great healthy body, his hearty laugh, his strength; Rance, who had never known the humiliation of physical inferiority. Mentally, Kerry clung to the big fellow, though all the time he knew his salvation lay in getting back from the coast immediately. A year of careful outdoor living would do it, the doctor had said.

But now Kerry suddenly discovered another fear—he was afraid to get away from people; afraid to go out into the wilderness with its treed stillness, its solitude. So he stayed on in town from week to week, assuming that desperate cheerfulness that comes of being so scared of a thing you dare not think about it. . . .

Then genial, easy-going old Doorknob Balsh, who tented next door, began dropping in to chat. One day he gave Kerry a pup—Duna. He was the fattest, most optimistic little pup in the world, waddling about a fellow's feet in glad friendliness; looking up in wriggling puppy astonishment when he found himself hanging from a trouser leg where his tiny sharp teeth had unwittingly caught; whimpering in baby lonesomeness at night, until permitted to snuggle himself to sleep in a fellow's arms. . . . It was Duna and Doorknob who helped him finally to make the decision that sent him to the hills.

But all that was three years behind him now. He had won back his health. He had faced lonely places until he could laugh at his former sickly fears of the wilderness. . . . Yet he couldn't laugh at this other thing—this uncertainty as to his courage on the Sweepstakes Trail.

With sudden vividness Kerry was back again on that Trail, back at the handle bars of his racing sled, uncertain of every dog in his team except Duna.

He felt himself once more stumbling on through the blizzard, from the shelter of his parka hood singing to his failing dogs, jollying them along the grinding ice of Bering Sea, turning inland and cheering them over the tops of mountains where both he and they had to crawl on their bellies to keep from being blown over into canyons; coaxing them to creep after him and Duna across lakes of glare ice; dragging them up the face of glaciers, where he had to hitch the whimpering, frightened animals to his belt and climb with spiked feet. With the race half done, he had quit at Candle. It would have been unnecessary cruelty to whip them back over the Trail.

Yet, suppose he'd been driving a string of dogs as good as Duna, would he have raced back over that two hundred miles of blizzard-torn course, where already three men had gone snow-blind and mad?

THE question that had begun to haunt him after the race was over was: Had he really quit at Candle because of his dogs, or was he still in his heart afraid of the country? Tradition had it that where a driver or a dog once quits on the Trail, there, in exactly the same place, would he quit again next time.

Kerry knew he could depend on Duna, great-hearted, trail-wise Duna, to lead on; but could he depend on himself, the man behind the handle bars, to give the command? Well, a fellow had to find out about himself; had to know. The Sweepstakes Trail had somehow become the symbol of all he must overcome in this wild North country. And in addition he had fallen under the spell, the inexplicable fascination of the grueling course.

There was something strange about that. To the man who had once driven on the Trail, it remained a perpetual lure, an eternal challenge. Besides, since last night a new and pleasantly helpful interest had been added—Barbee Neilan! With a girl like that to—

"Holy Sailor, Kerr! Snap out of your trance!" Unnoticed, Herrington had come back into the room. His next words brought Kerry back to reality.

"I was saying you'd better think this syndicate proposition over carefully before turning it down. We'll let you drive in the race, if that's all that's troubling you." Herrington thrust a cigarette into his mouth and reached for a match box.

"No use, Rance," Kerry answered. "My mind's made up. Even if I did think favorably of your Syndicate, Luce and I could never get along together. I've no use for him— Oh, I know he's handling your affairs now—and I know also that this Syndicate scheme is of his hatching, But surely, Rance, you can see for yourself it just isn't good sport. It's nothing but an out-and-out money-making—"

"Just a minute!" Herrington stopped in the act of striking a light and took the cigarette from his mouth. "You don't mean to insinuate we're going to pull anything crooked in this race, do you?" At Kerry's look of surprise, he laughed apologetically. "Oh, of course you don't, Kerr! I'm cranky as a bear with a sore head this morning. But I'm disappointed, too. I wanted you in with us."

HE LIGHTED his cigarette, and after flipping the burned match into the fireplace, leaned somewhat dejectedly against the mantel. In the strong light from the window Kerry again took note of the unhappy changes six months had wrought in Rance. Remembering the old days when he had felt the comfort and protection of Rance's splendid health, his lean, eager strength, his optimism, Kerry felt a vague sadness, an impulse of regretful tenderness for this friend of his whose sudden wealth had somehow stripped him of his former zest for life. Impulsively he came to his feet, and crossing over placed a hand on each of Herrington's shoulders.

"Cut the Syndicate, Rance," he said rather huskily, because of the sudden tightness in his throat. "Be a real sport and drive your own team this year!"

Herrington shook his head. But Kerry went on, in growing enthusiasm for the idea: "Get into training with the rest of us and take some of that easy fat off you, Rance. As for excitement! Why, you poker-playing old walrus, cards aren't in it. Come on, Rance! Drive your Siberians this year yourself. And then keep your eye glued on me, for, so help me Mabel, I'll run my cross-breeds and beat you!"

"Ho, ho!" Herrington's laugh was both patronizing and unbelieving. "Like fun you will, you runt!" His big hand came down on Kerry's shoulder. "A fine chance you'd stand against me—if I went into the race. Look at that!" He threw out his chest and complacently flexed his great arms. "A month's hard training, and I bet even Slim would have to go some to beat my time!"

He glanced up over the fireplace, where hung the painting of himself at the handle bars of his racing sled. "I don't know, though," he considered. "That's not such a bad idea. But if I do go into this personally, Kerr, I've got my own ideas on dog-punching. 'A woman, a dog, and a walnut tree, the more you beat 'em, the better—' Well, you know the rest. Now, take Tokon, for instance. What I should have done to that yellow hound last night was tie him up and beat the daylights out of him then and there. But, of course, with the ladies present, I—"

"I think you got off on the wrong foot with Tokon." Kerry ventured the remark cautiously. In Nome, meddling with another man's dog had precipitated more fights than meddling with another man's wife. "I don't believe in humiliating a dog. A dog's a lot like a human being. If you chain him up and whip him, it robs him of his self-respect. And last night—darn it, Rance, that was poor business bringing that splendid, high-strung husky in for the amusement of the crowd."

"HUH!" scoffed Herrington. "You'll be telling me next that the pup has an immortal soul! As for business—I own the brute, don't I? Paid two thousand cold cash for him, didn't I? Well, then, I'll take my own way of making him know who's his master. Trouble is, he's had too many owners who've been afraid of him. But he can't buffalo me. I'll bet you, Kerry, inside of three weeks I have that yellow fiend eating out of my hand—either that or he'll be dead.

"What you shaking your head about? Don't think I know how to train a dog, eh? Well, just to show you, old boy, that you're not the only dog-man in Nome, I'll tell you what I'll do—not only will I make a good pup of Mr. Tokon, but I ll drive the man-eating son-of-a-gun myself in the next Sweepstakes!"

Kerry's expression was such that Herrington's dark face broke into a sudden triumphant grin. "Ah-hah! Took some of the wind out of your sails that time, Kerr! And you're not the only one who'll be surprised. Barbee's been at me for weeks to drive my own team in the Sweepstakes. The girl's crazy about pups. Of course I can't let her touch my Siberians; but she's got around Jack West, the mail carrier, in some way, and he lets her take his team out whenever he's in town. She wanted me to go driving with her this afternoon—that was she on the telephone a while ago—but"—he yawned—"I don't feel like galloping all over the country with this headache of mine.

"Besides, I've got to discipline that young lady. You know, Kerry, you could have knocked me over with a feather last night when I saw that little rascal at the supper. Gosh! I've done my best to keep her out of that set. Pretty swift, you know, for a motherless kid of twenty. Of course, later on it will be different. But a man likes to keep his future wife—"

"Wife?" blurted Kerry.

"Certainly!" Herrington glanced at him in surprise; then burst into his big laugh. "Ho, ho! That's one on me! I forgot to tell you the most important thing that's happened to me since you've been gone. The fact is, old lad, I'm going to marry little Barbee Neilan!"

God rest Ye, Merrie Gentlemen

LANCASTER is beaten. The white rose mocks the red. Another winter . . . another Christmas . . . and England lies under forgetful snow.

Yew logs blaze beneath tavern rafters. All night the sound of singing comes from the castle. The boar's head is crowned with rosemary. The spiced brown bowl is passed from hand to hand. Lancaster or York? Who cares? Noel.

Another Christmas. The old words, the old songs come back. In thirty million homes the old customs are renewed. Holly and mistletoe, carols beneath the sky, and gifts exchanged, symbolic of the day of peace.

And what more ideal gift than the New Frigidaire? What better way to say the old, old phrase, "Merry Christmas"? For the New Frigidaire contributes to the happiness and safety of every member of your family, every day in the year. It is beautiful, powerful, incredibly quiet. It assures the constant low refrigerating temperatures which safeguard health and prevent food spoilage. It freezes an abundant supply of sparkling ice cubes. It provides delicious frozen salads and desserts. It brings a new convenience and a new economy into housekeeping, and it does all this, day after day, month after month, quietly, surely, automatically.

Let the New Frigidaire do for your family what Frigidaire is already doing for more than 750,000 others. And let it carry your Christmas greeting down through the months and years to come. Frigidaire Corporation, Subsidiary of General Motors Corporation, Dayton.

Wilson—the Greatest War Leader of Them All effect upon the morale of the French and British people.

"General Bridges did not say how many he wanted. Marshal Joffre said, 'Send a regiment, maybe a brigade. The Port of La Palice has already been set aside for you. It will do for a long time. Some day when your large war army of five hundred thousand is ready, we will give you other ports.'

"But we in America saw the need of a large army," Mr. Baker said to me. "Our ideas expanded under General Pershing's observations and recommendations, which he began to cable immediately after his arrival in Europe.

"As conditions there grew worse, his demands grew larger. The sixty-division program agreed upon as a minimum expanded to eighty divisions and then to one hundred. Finally, he was talking of the possibility of a hundred and twenty divisions. We were ready to give him as many as we could get across the ocean to him."

EACH of our divisions included 28,000 men, or more than double the average French, British, or German division. With army corps and field army and specialist troops, the 100-division program would have equaled 4,260,000 men. Mr. Hurley, the chairman of our Shipping Board, has given it as his opinion that, with the ship-building which was actually under way, 80 divisions, or 3,355,000 men could have been landed and maintained in France in 1919, the year which—in the summer of 1918—was expected to decide the war.

As a matter of fact, we did land approximately 2,000,000 equipped men in France before the Armistice. This was about four times as many as the Germans thought we could get there within that time. It is a better record than we, ourselves, thought we could make at the outset of the war; it is one of the greatest physical achievements in the history of troop-training and transportation—perhaps the greatest.

President Wilson and Mr. Baker clearly saw at the time the advantage of not sending over troops to France to be used in small quantities, unless, of course, in an emergency such as arose when the Germans made their smashing attack in March, 1918, and General Pershing immediately offered all our troops to the then General Foch for use in any way he thought necessary. Mr. Baker gives General Pershing the credit not only for this, but also for the tactical and strategical use made of our army in France.

He said: "From the time General Pershing went to Europe until the Armistice, he had the largest grasp of the situation and the truest and best-informed imagination of what was necessary to win the war of anybody on either side of the ocean, civil or military, with whom I came in contact.

"General Pershing will go down in history as a great commander. He has in a high degree the two qualities which are essential—imagination and daring."

It is one thing to plan having a large army; it is another thing to get it; it is still more difficult to get it quickly.

Therefore, I said to Mr. Baker: "In this country as in Great Britain there has been the mistaken idea in many quarters that only volunteering should be relied upon to raise an army, as there is something derogatory in conscription or compulsory universal military service. How was it, then, that we so quickly adopted conscription, particularly with a President who was a great liberal, and therefore opposed to compulsion in any form?"

Mr. Baker replied: "When I came to the War Department, I was unacquainted with practical military affairs. Therefore I had to rely upon the regular officers around me to give me all the facts bearing on any matter, and upon my legal training to sum up these facts and arrive at a correct solution.

"General Hugh Scott was then Chief of Staff, not yet having been retired for age. He was a most candidly honest and open man. His loyalty was touching." Here the Secretary leaned forward and became even more earnest in his address, saying: "I want to pause here to say that of all the memories I carried away with me from the War Department, and still cherish, nothing is more precious to me than the loyalty and honesty of purpose I found among the Regular Army officers I came in contact with.

"When it commenced to become evident that Germany intended to resume unrestricted submarine warfare, General Scott came to me one day, and said: 'Mr. Secretary, now that we are approaching war, we must have conscription.' He had a brief on the subject. Knowing his close friendship for General Wood, I suspected that it had been largely inspired by that general. On asking General Scott if this were so, he answered 'Yes.'

"At that time such impression as existed in my mind about conscription was largely limited to remembering that its enforcement during the Civil War had led to riots.

"However, after reading all the arguments I saw that it was not only logical from a military point of view, but in a democracy the only way really fair to the individual citizen. It distributed service justly, and prevented the individual who had a widowed mother or an invalid sister to support, or some other good reason for not going (which is none of the public's business), from becoming the target of suspicion and even abuse, which always happens under the volunteer system.

"I THEN went to the President. He listened to my argument carefully for about half an hour and then said: 'Plainly, you are right. It is the only proper thing to do. It is the democratic thing to do. Please have a draft of a law prepared, so that I may include it as a recommendation in my speech to Congress asking for a declaration of war.' I had the draft prepared in the War Department."

It is a matter of history that President Wilson and Mr. Baker, backed up by public opinion, quickly put the act through Congress.

Mr. Baker's answers had shown me a highly efficient war executive operating, as the Constitution had foreseen, as the coördinator of all our war activities toward the common end of beating the enemy. A national leader who relied upon subordinates, picked without regard to political or social standing but only upon their proven ability in their own lines, to furnish him the technical details. But how about the human side? Did this effective Executive have a personal interest in the war; did its surges toward defeat and victory emotionally affect him with depression in the first case and thrill him in the second?

Shortly before seeing Mr. Baker, I had asked this of Mr. Hurley, the chairman of our Shipping Board. This was the body which determined, by its supply of ships, how little or big was to be "the neck of the bottle" controlling the shipment of our troops to France. The fact that they gave the Army over a million dead-weight tons between January and June, 1918, and by December the same year over three million tons, shows how much they opened the neck.

Mr. Hurley replied, "Most emphatically 'Yes.' The President took at all times a direct personal interest in the progress of the fighting going on in Europe. He closely followed it. He was always thinking of means to increase our efforts.

"For example, the first of the great German drives in 1918 (against the British) greatly worried him. All the more so because the shipping we had available was not sufficient to carry the troops we had ready, and which were so badly needed in Europe. He sent for me. I found him thoughtful and anxious, but, if anything, more determined. He showed his strong purpose to get the American reinforcement to France in time, regardless of difficulties to be overcome. 'Hurley, we have simply got to go the limit!' he exclaimed."

MR. BAKER confirmed the President's personal interest in the progress of the fighting, and added that it extended to the officers and men in the Army.

"I will tell you two of the numerous incidents which show this," said the former Secretary of War. "The signing of officer commissions soon became a physical burden to the President, because of the large number of men commissioned, and the constant promotions which were being made. You know, before the war was over, we had two hundred thousand officers in the Army alone.

"Even on Sundays, when the President was trying to relax by going down the Potomac on his yacht, the 'Mayflower,' he would take large piles of commissions and spend hours signing them.

"Therefore, one day I said: 'Mr. President, I must find a legal way so that you will be relieved of this constant and increasing burden.'

"He replied: 'Hope you won't do that, Baker. This is the only contact I have with these fine men who are in the Army. I want them to have my signature as an evidence of the fact that I constantly think about them.'

"He was extremely interested in the personal welfare of the enlisted men also.

He sent for me once and showed me a letter from a private at one of the camps in this country complaining that the shopkeepers near by scandalously overcharged the soldiers. He was obviously angry. He said, 'Can't you stop this contemptible thing? If there is no direct legal way, can't you publish a black list and pillory such scoundrels before public opinion? I won't have our soldiers taken advantage of in this way! They get little enough as it is.'"

"Mr. Secretary," I said, "you have shown clearly that President Wilson made and carried through decisions essential to victory in war, a necessity too seldom understood by the 'peace' minds of statesmen; but you have not told me why he had a 'war' mind ready for use when the declaration of war came."

Mr. Baker replied: "President Wilson had a richly stored mind. He constantly resorted to it in coming to a decision. The facts of history were at his finger tips. He did not have to go to a book shelf, get down some volume and hunt for them. The facts of war as shown by the history of wars were thus well known to him. He had the mental courage to accept them as facts, and the moral courage to use them as the basis of his decisions."

President Wilson knew well the mistakes that had been made in America's several wars, and in the wars of Europe; he knew, even, the mistakes that had been made by the civil heads of Governments in the Great War. His conduct as a leader of America during our participation in the Great War was a great tribute to his knowledge!

Jealous? We Should Say Not!

And since, as I thought, it was my destiny to be a second Ellen Terry and to earn twenty pounds a week, I proceeded to plan my life accordingly.

"When I was twelve years old, I went to London and stayed with one of my mother's friends who knew Ellen Terry, and who induced her to grant me an interview.

"ELLEN TERRY was an intense, extraordinary, fascinating person. And of course I was so excited that my heart was thumping madly.

"'Well!' said Miss Terry, with her characteristic impetuosity, 'get up! Say something! Recite something!'

"And," said Miss Fontanne, "of all things in the world which I might have recited, I chose Ellen Terry's own great lines as Portia in 'The Merchant of Venice'! You remember; the speech about 'the quality of mercy.'

"After one involuntary groan of despair, she resigned herself to listen; and evidently I wasn't too terrible, for she decided to take me as a pupil. Now, Alfred, tell about your pieces."

"They were very good pieces!" declared her husband. "Everybody thought so—until I spoke them. When it came to reciting, I was the world's worst performer. The worst, but also the most persistent. If lack of encouragement could have held me down I'd never have seen the footlights, except from the audience.

"Not a soul ever hinted that I would be a second Irving, or would earn even twenty cents a week as an actor. Yet I never was so happy as when I was trying to speak a piece, mumbling the words, and waving my arms, apparently under the impression that I was a windmill.

"But the age of twelve was a milestone for me as well as for Lynn. Our school was to have a piece-speaking competition; and in spite of my lamentable lack of success in that line I determined to be one of the contestants.

"It had been borne in upon me, however, that I wasn't exactly a dazzling success at my favorite indoor pastime of speaking pieces. So I went to an old lawyer who was a Shakespeare enthusiast. And, by the way, he was a Pole, which adds another nationality to those which have influenced me.

"He coached me in Wolsey's speech: 'Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness.' And, thanks to my Polish friend, I actually won the prize. The only incident that dimmed the glory of the occasion was when my old nurse—and she was Irish—tearfully and loudly exclaimed: 'My darling, my darling! And he's only twelve!'"

"And after that triumph?" I prompted.

"Well, about that time, my stepfather decided to live in Finland. So, for about seven years, I spent my summers over there and my winters at school in this country. At Carroll College, in Waukesha, Wisconsin, I was the hardest worker they had—in the department of dramatics.

"That was my Oshkosh period. We used to go there to give our little plays before the patients in the insane hospital. A very appreciative audience too. At least they never stuck out their tongues at us, as they did at the calla lilies, which, for some unknown reason, always furnished the floral decorations.

"MEANWHILE, my family lost its money. But evidently we all retained our optimism, for I know I went to Boston, intending to study at Harvard.

"But Harvard never saw me. Instead, I got a job with the old Castle Square stock company to play extras at five dollars a week. I paid one dollar and a quarter a week for my room; and by taking frequent meals with some cousins who lived in Boston I managed to get along all right.

"After a while I was given small parts to do and was made assistant stage manager. My salary rose dizzily to thirty dollars a week. But no one ever led me to believe I would ever become a real actor. I was a sickly-looking boy, tall and gaunt, so all I ever got handed to me were old men's parts.

"As far as I can remember, I received just one bit of encouragement during the two years I was with the company. My lone admirer was a man who had been Margaret Anglin's stage manager. After seeing me once or twice, he told me he thought I was 'pretty good.'

"'This fall,' he said, 'I'm going to do a production for Miss Anglin. Perhaps I can get you a part in it.'

"I thanked him; but I thought it was just a passing bit of politeness. He would forget all about it, so I tried to do the same.

"Not long after this, I became so fed up with old men's parts that I threatened to resign if they gave me another. They did. So I quit. The management remained noticeably cheerful. But as for me, I was neither cheerful nor well, so I went home to Waukesha to recuperate.

"By some miracle of good luck, the man who had thought I was 'pretty good' didn't forget me; and that autumn I joined Miss Anglin's company. She was a great actress; and the two seasons I played with her were a wonderful help to me.

"Then followed several years with various companies, and a season in vaudeville with Lily Langtry as her leading man. The beautiful 'Jersey Lily' was sixty-three years old. I was around twenty-two. But I had a wonderful time playing with her. I'll never forget one thing about that vaudeville season. Before the curtain went up on the act, Mrs. Langtry always had the orchestra play 'Believe me, if all those endearing young charms.' Her charms certainly endured for a long time.

"Of course, this was all invaluable experience for me. Some people thought I was pretty good, but no one ever told me I was very good. Personally, I thought I was pretty bad. Anyway, bouquets did not come my way; so, perhaps in self-defense, I felt that personal bouquets didn't amount to much anyway.

"Time and again I saw plays fail, in spite of the fact that a big star headed the cast. Sometimes this happened with a play which would have succeeded if all the members of the company had done good work.

"If I had been inclined to grab glory for myself, this would have cured me. So long as you have to work with other people you've got to realize that the better they are, the better it is for you! If their work is done well, it helps your work. You are part of a human mechanism; and every part of that mechanism, even to the smallest cog, is important. I don't see how you can be jealous of a fellow-worker, any more than a wheel would be jealous of a cog, or a piston be jealous of a valve."

"But a human cog may want to become a wheel!" I said.

"I should hope so!" he agreed. "And in human mechanisms luckily they do become wheels—if they prove that they can do the work of a wheel. But you can't do that by trying to 'crab' the work of some other wheel."

THIS was the very subject I was eager to discuss. If we are honest, we must admit that it is hard not to be jealous of someone who gets more praise, more compliments, and perhaps more money, than we receive. Women are jealous of the admiration which other women, even their own sisters, receive. Men are jealous, even of their best friends, when their friends outstrip them in business, or in their profession.

A man is almost instinctively jealous of a woman who successfully competes with him in work. And a woman thinks that she doesn't have a fair chance against a male competitor. Each of them is pretty

Motorists Everywhere Say

The Sooner a Car Is Simonized—The Better

—because Simoniz protects all finishes, including Duco and lacquers, from snow, sleet and ice in winter, as well as the dust, dirt and traffic fumes in summer.

New cars should be Simonized before being driven very far. All motor car finishes need the lasting protection only Simoniz gives—and its value is soon realized, for Simonizing not only provides lasting beauty, but keeps colors from fading and makes all finishes last longer.

When finishes are dulled and dirty looking, Simoniz Kleener quickly and easily removes all grime, discolorations and blemishes, restoring the lustre and color. Simoniz then provides a hard, beautiful surface that can easily be kept clean and bright by wiping occasionally with a dry cloth.

Insist on Simoniz for cleaning and protecting your car—for cars kept beautiful with Simoniz are always beautiful.

certain to be jealous of the other one.

But here are Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne, man and wife, measuring their abilities, as I said before, side by side. Yet I had been told that there wasn't a spark of jealousy between them.

And naturally I wanted to find out how they managed it. Mr. Lunt's remarks about wheels and cogs seemed to shed some light. But I needed more background for the picture, so I asked Miss Fontanne to go on with her own story.

Her first appearance on the stage was when she walked on as a child at His Majesty's Theatre in London. Then she was graduated to minor rôles, which, however, didn't bring her within hailing distance of being a second Ellen Terry, or of earning anything like twenty pounds a week. But she kept on, more or less courageously, until the war came.

That upset the theatre, just as it did the rest of the world. People wanted music and laughter and dancing. They wouldn't go to serious plays; so Lynn Fontanne, out of a job, took to driving an army truck.

But before all this happened, Laurette Taylor, who was playing in London, saw Lynn Fontanne act. She was amazed at her versatility—Lynn Fontanne portrayed three sharply contrasted parts in one play. The two became great friends, a friendship which is still going strong.

ONE day, as Miss Fontanne was getting into her truck, a cablegram was handed to her. It was from Laurette Taylor, offering her a part in a New York production at one hundred dollars a week.

"How much is one hundred dollars in English money?" she demanded of the officer beside her.

"About twenty pounds," he replied.

She handed him the cablegram.

"Does that say what I think it does?" she asked incredulously.

In awe-struck tones he read it aloud. To an English soldier at that time, twenty pounds a week was a fortune. Half a dozen times during the day, he asked to see the cablegram again. He simply couldn't believe it.

But to Miss Fontanne it was the fulfillment of at least one of those childhood prophecies. It proved that Destiny was on the job.

And Destiny continued to be on the job. Under war restrictions, passports were difficult to obtain. Usually, months were required to get permission to leave the country. But now, in some mysterious way, red tape was cut to smithereens; and within ten days Lynn Fontanne was on the ocean, bound for America.

For several seasons she played in Laurette Taylor's company. The magic twenty pounds a week were hers, and she was attracting favorable notice; but she had by no means "arrived."

There is a curious similarity in the stories of Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne. Both worked long, hard, and steadfastly. Neither achieved a quick, dazzling success. But, meanwhile, in each of them was growing a rock-bound belief in coöperation as the great essential to achievement. Don't forget this as we go on with the story.

Up to twelve years ago, they had not even seen each other, either on or off the stage, until one day Lunt saw Lynn Fontanne in "Wooing of Eve." In it she played the part of a weeping bride with a red nose. He thought her a superb actress, but he did not see in her his future bride.

Then, in 1919, Fate decided that these two talented young people should meet.

A famous dramatic critic, in describing this meeting, says, "Lynn Fontanne made such a deep impression on Alfred Lunt that in bowing low over her hand he missed his step and pitched backward down a flight of stairs."

HOW much of this record of their meeting is dramatic license, and how much is truth I couldn't discover. But without a doubt Mr. Lunt did fall hard for the lovely Lynn Fontanne the moment they were introduced.

"I thought she was the most amusing creature I had ever seen!" he said to me. "And after living with her six years, I still think so." (There's marvelous testimony for you.)

"And how about you?" I asked Miss Fontanne.

"I succumbed just as abruptly—and just as permanently," she laughed. "I was sitting at the back of the stage, waiting while Alfred rehearsed a scene in the play he was to appear in. I remember I was thinking how wonderful he was, when Sidney Toler, who was sitting beside me, said, 'That young man's voice is literally a gift from heaven. A voice like that can't be acquired. You have to be born with it.'

"Two weeks after our meeting," Miss Fontanne said, "Alfred proposed to me."

"But you weren't married until three years later, were you?" I asked.

"No," broke in Mr. Lunt frankly. "We couldn't afford to get married. Our salaries were not munificent. Both Lynn and I had certain family responsibilities, so we had a long engagement, during which we were together every minute we could possibly manage.

"I was playing leading man for Billie Burke in 'Intimate Strangers' and Lynn was the star of 'Dulcy,' when we finally decided to get married. I remember I had a bad attack of laryngitis and just managed to croak out the necessary responses. In fact 'Yes' was the last word I spoke that day.

"We took a little flat and proceeded to live happily ever after. The only furniture we had in it for a time was a bed, a gorgeous Spanish cupboard, which I had acquired in Cleveland while on a road tour, a bath mat, and, please make note of this—a complete set of kitchen stuff. Later on some friends asked us to store their phonograph for them. We did so gladly. As a matter of fact, it was a perfect godsend when we needed an extra seat."

MR. LUNT saw my eye wandering over the apartment. He laughed. "We've collected more furniture now, and we have moved into more spacious quarters. But it took us six years to do it. Most of the things you see were picked up by degrees at auctions, some at second-hand stores and some pieces abroad."

After a tour of inspection around the apartment, with the Lunts proudly showing off their cherished possessions, we got back again to the subject of their careers. "It was not until two years after we were married," said Mr. Lunt, "that we joined the Theatre Guild, and for the past four years we have with few exceptions appeared in the same plays."

"That's just the point I wish to get to," I exclaimed. "Most of the time, you have appeared together in the same plays. But suppose one of you has a bigger and better part in a play than the other one has. Can you live happily together under those conditions?"

They looked at me as if they didn't understand.

"Suppose Mr. Lunt has a more important rôle than you have," I said to Miss Fontanne. "It gives him a bigger chance to 'put himself over.' Naturally, he gets more applause; probably better notices from the critics. How can you help being a little bit jealous?"

"Jealous?" she echoed in genuine astonishment. "Why be jealous of him? He didn't write the play and make his part the most important one. Sometimes Alfred has the big rôle and sometimes I have it. Sometimes the rôles are about equal. We simply do the best with what parts we have, so that the play will be a fine and well-rounded performance."

"That's right!" exclaimed Mr. Lunt. "In one play, for example, I had the biggest part, while Lynn had the smallest one. Moreover, it was a rôle she didn't really enjoy, because it wasn't congenial to her.

"But do you think she would do it carelessly, just because it didn't appeal to her or because it wasn't what is called 'a fat part'? On the contrary, she did it marvelously. Incidentally, it made a big hit. But she wasn't trying to win a personal success. She was simply working to make the whole performance a good one.

"When she did make a hit, I was more pleased than she was herself. And not just because it was Lynn, either! I love to see good craftsmanship.

"But that isn't all. Just take the practical point of view, the actual bread-and-butter point of view. I'm working for a living. Other people are employed on the same 'job' with me. If we all pull together and make the job a success, I shall have my bread and butter; and if we make it a big success, I'll have jam and marmalade and extra trimmings too. That's the plain truth and I don't forget it.

"BUT if you want to know the real reason why Lynn and I can't be jealous, of each other or of any member of the company, it is this: We think first, last, and all the time, about the work! We are not scheming to get personal glory. It's a lot bigger and broader than that. We want to see the job itself a success. We've never talked about this; have we, Lynn? I don't think it ever has occurred to us to be jealous of each other. Sometimes she gets a better chance; and sometimes I get it. But what does it matter, so long as the work goes ahead?"

"Let's put it another way," I suggested. "Suppose that your wife, in spite of this honest teamwork, eventually wins more success and glory than you do. We will suppose it, just for the sake of argument. Will you be able to help feeling jealous then?"

"Some people can jump higher than others, can't they?" he said, after a moment's thought. "And some can run

"Startling"—scientists call health value discovered in simple Japan Tea—

THOSE minor ailments from which we all suffer occasionally! Little discomforts, not serious enough to make us really ill—yet which take the edge off many a day!

A simple safeguard against several of these maladies has now been found in old familiar Japan green tea. This flavor-laden tea we all enjoy, is today known to be rich in a precious food element which is entirely lacking in most of the foods we eat.

"It now appears," writes a distinguished scientist, "that this condition is rather common among grown people. Ill health characterized by certain symptoms may be looked for in those who habitually take too little Vitamin C. These symptoms are: loss of energy, a muddy complexion, fleeting pains often mistaken for rheumatism."

Scientists have now found that old familiar Japan green tea is rich in the precious food element —Vitamin C

Rich in this precious element

Loss of energy! In how many ways it can make the day less pleasant to live! Nervousness, poor appetite, sleeplessness, lethargy, low vitality so often come in its train. Those who are lacking in energy, who tire easily, miss much of the sparkle of life.

How many, too, have sallow, lifeless skins they hate to see in the mirror! How many others are troubled with so-called rheumatic pains!

For those who are afflicted with these ailments, there is a new precaution, easy to take, which may help many. Certainly no cure-all can be found in the pleasant, fragrant cups of Japan green tea that millions have been drinking for years. But today it is known that Japan green tea brings us an abundance of health-building Vitamin C.

Grown on the emerald hills of Japan, cured by a special method without fermentation, Japan green tea reaches us rich in Vitamin C and with all the sparkling, natural flavor of tea at its best

A simple safeguard against several common ailments—these fragrant, flavor-laden cups of Japan green tea

If you suffer from any of these maladies—loss of energy, sallow skin, or so-called rheumatic pains—try this simple plan: Drink fragrant, flavor-laden cups of Japan green tea regularly at lunch, at supper, in the afternoon. Profit by its rich supply of precious Vitamin C. In a few weeks, you will probably feel and look more vigorous—more vitally alive. Whenever you drink tea, be sure it is Japan green tea.

For years one of the two most popular kinds of tea in this country, Japan green tea comes in several grades—in packages under various brand names and in bulk. Your grocer has it or can get it. American-Japanese Tea Committee, 782 Wrigley Building, Chicago.

faster. They can, because they have the ability to do it. All right! If I do my work the very best I can, and if somebody else—Lynn, for instance—does the same kind of work better than I do it—well, it simply means she can 'jump higher' than I can!

"It seems to me," he went on, "that the way to escape being jealous is to keep your mind on two things: When you are working on the same job with other people, think about making the job a success. And also watch your own work, to see how well you can do that! Everybody is climbing his own ladder. If he goes just as fast and as high as he is able to climb, he can be satisfied with himself."

"May I ask a very personal question?" I said.

"Go as far as you like!" they both replied.

"Well," I said, "don't you sometimes quarrel over little things? Most married people do."

"WELL, it all depends on what you mean by quarreling," sparred Alfred Lunt. "If you mean getting mad at each other, calling each other names and saying, 'I wish I'd never married you,' and all that sort of stuff—no, we don't quarrel. But," he said with a boyish grin, "we do argue, and we do disagree violently, but amicably, about things."

"What, for instance?" I asked.

"Oh, about clothes and about our parts—it is nearly always some detail connected with the theatre that we argue about.

"When we were playing 'At Mrs. Beam's,' Lynn and I had to stage a real scrap in one scene. She had to throw things at me, slap my face, push me around, and the situation got pretty rough for a few minutes. At least, it should have got rough, but I couldn't get her to scrap as if she really meant it. Consequently, the scene lacked realism. Lynn would deliberately miss me when she aimed, and as for slapping my face, all I got was a gentle pat.

"I was furious about it, and told her she had to make it a real rough-and-tumble fight. She burst into tears and wailed, 'But, Alfred, I may hurt you.' Well, anyway, after that everything she threw at me hit me, my face got slapped good and hard, and she finished by pushing me over a chair backward. In fact, she put so much vigor into her performance that even some of the Theatre Guild people used to wonder how we could go home happily together after such a scrap."

Having seen the "scrap" in question I could well understand how some of the Guild people felt about it. It was a grand fight.

I had seen the Lunts in nearly all their parts, and had been struck by their amazing versatility, and also by their marvelous memories. Naturally, I wanted to know if they memorized easily. I was soon enlightened.

"It is hard for both of us to learn new parts," said Miss Fontanne. "But, if anything, it is harder for me than Alfred. Of course, we criticize and coach each other as we go along. Luckily for us, our apartment has three floors, so that when we are in the final throes of memorizing I take the top floor and Alfred the lower, or vice versa; thus, we don't conflict with each other at all."

"WELL!" I said, "now that I know something about how you became actors and how you work, I should like to know something about what you do with your spare time."

This well-intentioned remark brought forth a shout of laughter. "Spare time!" gasped Miss Fontanne, "why, we haven't any! We are seldom outside the theatre except during the hours from midnight to eleven the next morning. And that often includes Sundays as well. Usually, we are acting in two plays that alternate every week and rehearsing a third one at the same time. And when we go on the road for a short tour, we have to brush up on the whole season's repertory. As you may well imagine, this routine keeps us pretty busy. And if we do happen to have a spare afternoon at our disposal, and there is a matinée playing somewhere, like all good theatrical folk we take in a show."

"But Mr. Lunt is so limber," I insisted, "surely he goes in for exercise."

Miss Fontanne laughed. "If Alfred took any more exercise than he gets at the theatre he'd kill himself."

I looked at Mr. Lunt. "That's right," he agreed. "My only form of calisthenics is opening the Sunday paper. But, seriously, some of the plays call for very strenuous action. When I was acting in 'Volpone' I had to crawl on my knees so much that I developed painful calluses, and I was plentifully covered with black and blue spots through falling over chairs, beds, and other stage furnishings. Yes, it is a strenuous life all right; but we do enjoy it, don't we, Lynn?"

I remembered that when I saw Mr. Lunt in "Clarence"—the comedy that Booth Tarkington wrote with him in mind for the part of the returned soldier—he had played both the saxophone and the piano. Imagine my astonishment when I found that he knew neither of those instruments when the part was offered to him. And I always had had a sneaking idea that an actor's life afforded plenty of leisure!

On their two months' vacation the Lunts generally go abroad. But even then, I discovered, they do not spend much time resting. "I always," said Alfred Lunt, "accompany Lynn to all the fall fashion openings in Paris—I like helping my wife choose her clothes; and when we are in London she goes round the men's shops with me."

THIS is a picture of Lynn Fontanne and Alfred Lunt as I saw them. Young, unspoiled, human, serious, funny; indefatigable workers, thoroughly in love with their jobs and with each other. I think they show up remarkably well as our hero and heroine. Certainly they are twin stars in the drama of human life, no matter what rôles they are playing on the stage.

"THREE LIVES IN ONE, and Always Ahead of His Time." That, briefly, sums up David Starr Jordan, scientist, educator, and crusader for peace. Few men living have wrung as much out of life as has Doctor Jordan. Next month you will read the story of his remarkable triple career.

competitors and for us, too; so I stuck to my idea. Our silverware business has now grown to $14,000,000 a year. So perhaps," he smiled, "it wasn't a bad idea after all."

Almost from the time he went back to Kenwood, Noyes was in charge of the various departments of the business. In 1897, the office of general manager was created for him. In 1910 he became also the president of the company. He was the center not only of the business but of the whole community.

Those early years, when power and prosperity were his for the mere taking, were the most dangerous ones of his life. It was then that the sincerity of his decision about riches was put to the test.

It is comparatively easy, when wealth is not being offered us, to say that we don't care much about being rich, anyway. But to know that we can have great wealth, and to take only a competence instead—that is a test which few men can meet.

"This is the way I feel about it," says Mr. Noyes. "I want to be happy! But how in the world can I be happy, if the people around me are dull and drab and *un*happy? Just from a selfish point of view, then, I want to be surrounded by folks who are having a good time, getting pleasure and satisfaction out of life.

"Maybe it is a survival of the old Community spirit which I absorbed in my childhood. At any rate, I don't believe tremendous contrasts in material wealth are good for anybody. But I don't believe in a dead level, either! I think some people earn, and therefore deserve, more than others. But I don't believe in grabbing all you can get, just because you can get it. Give the other fellow a chance to have a share. It will be more fun to work with him, to play with him, and to live with him if he is an interested and happy companion.

"YEARS ago, the stock in the Community business was divided among the members. Nobody was 'gypped' out of his or her share.

"Twenty-five years ago, I introduced the principle that no one person should own more than three per cent of the stock. We have adhered to that principle ever since.

"As the business increased, new stock was given to the shareholders. The original holdings have now been multiplied five times. But the percentage of distribution remains the same. No one individual holds more than three per cent of the total amount of stock.

"With the growth of production, we employed more and more help from outside. We have always paid our workers more than the union scale of wages; and I am just as interested in their being happy as in being happy myself.

"Most of them live in Sherrill, right across the creek. The O. C. L. owned the land there, and has sold it to the em-

A knight of the dotted-line learns how to triple his Earning Power

"A month ago, as I left home, the slamming door indicated my mood. I had had a good breakfast, but something was lacking. I met my first prospect with a cheerless 'Hello' and a forced smile. My talk was unimpressive, and I was turned down cold. That had a bad effect on my next interview and my next. At night I came home without a name on the dotted line and in a bad temper. I concluded I was a poor salesman.

"This morning I left home with a cheerful 'Goodbye', closed my first prospect after a mutually pleasant interview, and did a good day's business. I returned home with a box of candy for my wife and a cheery 'Is supper ready?'

"Later, my wife and I were trying to figure out why I had tripled my earning power, gained weight and become so much easier to live with—all within a month. We could find only one reason for it—during this month we have used Postum as our mealtime drink, in place of caffein."*

MIRACULOUS, you may say, that such an improvement in health, spirits and earning power could be effected within the short space of a month. Yet, when you come right down to it, it is not remarkable at all.

For the regular use of a caffein beverage at mealtime, with its continued irritation of the nerves and nightly interruption of sleep, has made many a normally cheerful man short-tempered and moody. And when a man is "in the dumps", he has small chance of impressing others favorably. But remove the cause of the trouble—substitute a wholesome drink for the harmful beverage—the world begins to smile again!

To prove it, eliminate caffein beverages from your diet—make Postum your mealtime drink for thirty days. See what a difference—what a wonderful difference!—this simple change can work.

For Postum can never get on your nerves, can never keep you awake, can never cause headaches or indigestion. Postum is made of roasted whole wheat and bran—no trace of any artificial stimulant in it. You'll like Postum for its flavor, too—a rich, full-bodied flavor millions prefer to that of any other mealtime drink!

Your grocer has Postum. Or mail the coupon—we will send you one week's supply, free, as a start on your 30-day test.

This letter, from a salesman in a Tennessee city, is representative of thousands of letters received from Postum users within the last few months.*

ployees. Most of them own their homes. We help them to do this.

"They have their clubs, their community house, their golf links. I guess every family has an automobile! I know someone counted five hundred cars parked outside the factory. And they weren't all flivvers, either!

"I believe, too, in giving young blood a chance. It's good for the veins of a business. I don't want to have people sitting around waiting for me to die off! If a man makes himself really valuable, I believe in recognizing the fact.

"A good while ago I set up the principle that we all must have understudies. We must be selecting and training men to step into our places.

"And we mustn't hang on to our jobs indefinitely! Gradually get the other fellow in; and gradually ease ourselves out.

"I had been general manager as well as president until a couple of years ago. But for several years my son-in-law, 'Dunc' Robertson, had been qualifying for that position. Not because he was my son-in-law! But because he was the man for the job, and everybody admitted it.

"I TURNED it over to him and cut my salary. Other men in the organization have done the same thing. They have voluntarily reduced their income, given someone else an opportunity to have greater responsibility and correspondingly greater financial reward.

"The result is that we have the advantage of both the older heads and the younger ones. That's a good thing, because we need both. And it does away with abrupt breaks. We have a continuous flow of ability instead.

"When I came back here there were nine members on the board of directors. Well, every business man knows how hoary and hidebound a board of directors can become! Sometimes it's little more than an atrophied appendage of the organization.

"But our board of directors is anything but atrophied! When a man makes good, conspicuously and consistently, we put him on the board. We now have twenty-two members. It's a good thing for them that they are there. And it's a fine thing for the business to have them there, with their energy and brains and initiative.

"This idea of giving the other fellow his share—even if it is part of what you could grab as your share—makes things more interesting even outside of the business.

"Just for example: Suppose I had a whopping big income; so much bigger than anyone else's that I would be in a class by myself. How could I have any real companionship? People would either avoid me or toady to me.

"I might have my own private golf links, where the favored few would play lonesome games with me. If I had twice as good a car as anybody else, nobody would want to 'talk cars' with me. I couldn't swap experiences with the folks around me. I couldn't even swap cigars.

"What a life! The higher you get above people, the farther you are from their hands and hearts. What I want is companionship; mutual interests with the people around me; and the mutual ability to follow up our tastes."

In brief, that expresses what may be called "the social creed" of Pierrepont Noyes. I hope you want to know how it has worked out, because I am fairly bursting to tell. At least I can try to picture the results as they impressed me:

Here, then, is this little community of Kenwood. Technically, it is part of a larger town; but in reality it is simply a village with a few hundred inhabitants.

The factories—two of them—are present; but somehow they are invisible until you hunt for them. There is a big administration building facing a wonderful sweep of green lawn. And this stone office building is as beautiful as if it were the gem of a college campus.

There are forty or fifty houses, irregularly placed, not in formal rows. All of them are charming. The one occupied by the president is no larger and no more attractive than any one of a dozen others.

There is only one house which you would describe as a mansion; and that one is the Mansion. You never lose sight of its mellow red brick walls. It is always part of the visible picture.

Inescapably, too, it is part of the invisible spirit of the community. Even I, a stranger, was conscious of this feeling.

During the day, half a dozen people said to me: "We are like one big family."

I knew they were telling the truth, because I could feel it myself. They are like a lot of relatives, their lives all interwoven together.

Mr. Noyes's married daughter said to me: "Sometimes, of course, things seem a bit stale and dull. We wonder whether we're not getting rather fed up with one another. But it's only a passing mood. We soon snap out of it—especially if one of us gets into a jam of any kind.

"We are always dead sure of one thing: If we need sympathy, or help, we can count on every member of the entire clan. I know absolutely that if I were in trouble, every man here—or, for that matter, every man that was brought up here—would be as loyal and as helpful as if he were my own brother."

YES, they are like a big family; a family that is full of fun and of the vim which can be described only as "pep." They have the same interests—and as many—as we New Yorkers have.

They not only read books, some of them actually write books. Imagine the head of a great business finding time to write a novel! Yet that's what P. B. Noyes has done. He is the author of "The Pallid Giant," an extremely well-written and interesting book.

His daughter has written a mystery novel. I heard her father threatening to write one, too. He probably will! Some of these extraordinary folks write poetry. Moreover, it is published and paid for; and, as perhaps some of you know, many poems are written, but few are paid for.

They have their own little magazine at Kenwood. It is called "The Community Quadrangle"; a name which has an interesting history.

Almost entirely shut in by the rambling wings of the Mansion is a grassy square, shaded by wonderful trees. In the old days, the Community members gathered there for outdoor religious services. It was called "the Quadrangle"; and that name is now applied to this "family magazine" which is written by and for the members of the clan.

It is as delightful as it is remarkable. Old and young contribute to it. They make their own illustrations, write their own poetry. One of them, who is stationed in New York, reviews the latest plays. If some member of the community goes to Atlantic City, or Florida, or Alaska, or Europe, there is a live and interesting letter about it in "The Quadrangle."

All this, as I see it, is the direct result of the creed which Mr. Noyes has put into effect. Instead of making himself a multi-millionaire, he has made it possible for the people of his community to cultivate their tastes and to have a mutual enjoyment of the good things of life.

They read and paint and write and travel. They appreciate music. It seemed to me that everyone I met played some sort of musical instrument.

They play other things too. They have golf links and tennis courts. They ride and swim. As for jig-saw puzzles, they have a wonderful collection, including the largest one in the world. They made it themselves! It contains eight thousand pieces and is seven feet square. At least it will be, if they ever get it put together.

IN EVERY one of their activities, from the puzzle to their fourteen-million-dollar business, Pierrepont Noyes is their leader. And don't think it is a case, as the old saying goes, of choosing to be a "big toad in a little puddle, rather than a little toad in a big puddle." Mr. Noyes has been a big man in big places.

During the war he was First Assistant Fuel Administrator, a big enough job for anybody.

After peace came, he went to Europe to look after his business affairs over there. It was when the details of the Rhineland occupation were being settled and the American authorities were trying to decide on the right man to be our Commissioner at Coblentz.

Noyes happened to pass the Crillon one day, so he dropped in to say "How-d'ye-do" to Bernard Baruch, whom he had known in Washington.

He didn't get a chance to say even "Hello." Baruch practically made him Rhineland Commissioner at sight.

Mr. Noyes and his wife were at Coblentz a year. During that time he worked with the big men of other countries. He and his wife entertained, and were entertained by, distinguished personages. But here is something very characteristic of them both: It did not, for one moment, change their attitude toward life.

"When we were by ourselves," Mr. Noyes told me, "we used to laugh and say to each other: 'Isn't this just like the Wizard of Oz?'"

Instead of being intoxicated by that sort of life, instead of developing a thirst for being kotowed to as a personage, he came back to Kenwood when the Rhineland job was finished. Back to his home, his work, his people. Back to the creed in which he believes and by which he lives, the creed that he would rather be surrounded by happy and comfortable companions than to live in lonely grandeur behind a fence of gold.

..and the Christmas Spirit need never die

HERE'S a gift more welcome than all others combined—that keeps the happy holiday spirit alive not only during the Christmas period, but throughout the year. And best of all, it's a gift the whole family can enjoy—a Brunswick Billiard Table for the home—at a price you can afford to pay.

If you love laughter and liveliness, don't miss the entertainment that this great game affords. For billiards at home opens up a whole new world of fun, sport and recreation not only for adults, but for the children as well. More important, it makes the home a center of interest for growing youngsters and their friends. Keeps them under your guiding influence during their formative years.

There's a fascination and a lure to billiards that is hard to describe. If you have played it you know what it is. If you haven't played you'll sense it the first time you pick up a cue. Thrills, excitement, the uncertainty of the game—the ever-changing opportunities for making unusual shots, there's never a moment of dullness, of boredom in billiards. You're always eager to play.

Billiards offers great exercise, too. Eminent health authorities claim that it is the most sane and healthful form of exercise the average adult can take. Mentally refreshing, as well. Takes your mind off cares and worries. Gives you new interests, mental relaxation.

And now for the first time the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., makers of the finest club and commercial billiard equipment, offer a table in the juvenile sizes for as little as $8.95. Accurately made, built with typical Brunswick precision, it is sold—completely equipped ready to play—in leading stores everywhere.

The larger size Brunswick tables which can be seen at all Brunswick branches may be purchased on our easy payment plan. Only a modest initial payment required. They are available in sizes to fit every home—some with folding legs and others designed to conform with the costliest surroundings.

See the Brunswick juvenile tables at your favorite store. For information pertaining to the larger tables, visit the nearest Brunswick branch or write for complete descriptions and prices.

Christmas—The Magic Season

this season is that such mishaps are taken as signals for jollification. Even Christmas dinner had been waited for us. We had it by candle-light, and with laughter over our adventure. . . . Delays usually make us irritable and puddle-browed; but because at Christmas all's well with the heart, all's well with everything else.

Since all my life has been spent in the country—most of it in very remote districts of southern South Carolina, because of the humble birthplace of Christ, and because the singular breadth of His humanity seems luminously to overshine all life, I have always been curiously interested in the relations of animals to Christmas. That there may be some relation, Marcellus, describing the vanishing of the Ghost in "Hamlet," thus expresses himself:

It faded on the crowing of the cock.
Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
This bird of dawning singeth all night long;
And then, they say, no spirit dares stir abroad;
The nights are wholesome; then no planets strike,
No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm,
So hallowed and so gracious is that time.

THERE is an ancient English superstition to the effect that on Christmas Eve every animal and every bird goes down on its knees in adoration of the newborn Master. Plantation negroes, than whom few people of any race are more spiritually aware, came to believe this legend, and they made me as a child believe it.

Convinced that what these dusky worshipers were telling me was true, and not a little impressed by the grandeur of the phenomenon as it was described, I went one Christmas Eve at home to the stable yard, and there sat blinking drowsily with a negro comrade, while the stars blazed, and the pines grieved, and the moss banners from the live-oaks sighed grayly in the gentle wind. As midnight, the mystic hour, approached, we became restless and alert, and our nervousness was probably communicated to the various creatures in the ample old barnyard. The roosters crowed with uncommon assurance and vigor; the hogs roamed about, grunting with unwonted enthusiasm—but with too much disconsolateness, I thought; and the sheep bleated with uncommon pathos.

After a while, from the mournful depths of the pine forest, where we had with some trepidation heard him weirdly intoning, we saw a great horned owl beat his noiseless, imposing flight. And he alighted on the ground, not far from us. He was only foraging, but we believed he was getting ready to worship—this ancient sage of the wildwoods! Shortly after we saw the owl, thrillingly we became aware that an old ox near us had taken a notion to get up. You know how an ox seems to lie down in order to rise. For a moment he assumed a most singular position: his back and his hind quarters were up, but his head was quite low. As a matter of fact, as my awed comrade tremblingly pointed out, the ox was actually kneeling!

I remember how we two children were impressed; how much more mystical the Holy Night seemed because of this strange corroboration of our belief. I remember how, next morning, when we told the older folks of what we had seen, we were not laughed at. We were left to our faith and our wonder.

THE world says, a foolish superstition! Technically, yes. But the world is so full of miracles, and all life is so essentially mysterious that I should be the last to assert that wild creatures have no consciousness of God. We do not know what they know. They sometimes look at us with eyes of fathomless sagacity; and so serene and ordered are their lives, so joyous and sustained their philosophy, that there is good reason to believe they may be in far closer touch with the Divine Spirit than we have been in the habit of supposing they possibly could be. It is something akin to this thought that David Morton has so beautifully expressed:

The mild-eyed Oxen and the gentle Ass,
By manger or in pastures that they graze,
Lift their slow heads to watch us where we pass,
A reminiscent wonder in their gaze.
Their low humility is like a crown,
A grave distinction, they have come to wear—
Their look gone past us—to a little Town,
And a white miracle that happened there.

An old, old vision haunts those quiet eyes,
Where proud remembrance drifts to them again,
Of something that has made them humbly wise,
—These burden-bearers for the race of men—
And lightens every load they lift or pull,
Something that chanced because the Inn was full.

Because my memories of Christmas are so closely associated with plantation life, I treasure fondly some of the quaint beliefs of the dusky humble companions of my boyhood years. Often as a lad I sat up on Christmas Eve, somewhat to the inconvenience of those playing Santa Claus—sat up because I wanted "to hear Christmas fall." And it always fell, somehow or other, though not precisely as the negroes declared it did. I never heard it; but the truly faithful always did. Ears that are dutifully attuned to hear something supernatural usually find it distinctly audible. My hearing, I suppose, was too gross; but I used to be immensely impressed by the far spiritual advancement of those negroes who declared that they had heard the remote and mystic detonation.

I RECALL a very remarkable statement about Christmas made to me by one who might well be supposed to have no heart for so joyous a season. This was a solitary old negro, who, having long outlived his own generation, resided remotely and alone on the borders of the great swamp near home. While I used to take him food and clothes, I never did quite understand how Old Weston lived. The members of his own race were afraid of him, as they usually are of age and sagacity. They insisted that his familiars, the hiddle-diddle-does (horned owls), brought food to him. At any rate, I always found him serene and cheerful.

Late one Christmas afternoon I went over to take him a basket of things, and during my visit I tried to get his "slant" on Christmas. His eyes seemed to me to be seeing things invisible to mine.

"You have Christmas once a year," he said; "but I have it all the time."

"How so, West?" I asked.

"You live with your people and friends, and they act one way all the year, and another way at Christmas. Since all my people have gone from me, I have been living with God. He acts the same to me all the time. He acts just like people do at Christmas."

Since Old Weston gave me that thought, our great holiday has had a new and more sacred meaning, and he helped me to learn to go to simple, elemental people for some of those observations on life most worth remembering.

What Christmas means to me matters only to the degree to which the experiences of others corroborate my own. I shall tell what certain Christmases have actually brought me—not in my dutifully hung stocking, but rather in the stocking of my heart. Thus may I be able to echo the songs that you yourself have sung. Our experiences at such a sacred and joyous time are especially likely to be similar, at least in spirit; and at no other season is there so much awareness of our universal brotherhood.

BECAUSE, since earliest childhood days, I have had a ruling passion for nature and a love for all wild creatures, Christmas has had for me an especial appeal as a naturalist. No man who roams the woods and fields, who would rather spend an hour in a solitary forest than an afternoon at the matinée; no man who feels in the resplendent order and beauty of the universe the touch of the Hand Divine can come to a season like Christmas without feeling that it is just and right thus to commemorate the birth of the Son of God.

The naturalist has, or should have—though making no claims for myself—the integrity of insight of the true mystic. He knows that creation is a miracle. He longs to account for it. Christ as the Son of the Almighty accounts for it. Therefore, the naturalist welcomes Christmas as a time when we, with eminent sagacity, acknowledge and rejoice in the birth of the child of our Creator.

When asked if he saw anything more in a sunset than the subsiding of a red disk, the poet William Blake said he could only answer that he saw far more; he saw an innumerable company of the Heavenly Host crying, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty!" And that is what every human heart should cry, not alone at the gorgeous spectacle of sundown, but at sight of the tiniest bluebell, the frailest wild white violet, the faintest star that gleams in the immense mansions of "the huge and thoughtful night."

I once knew of what a whole countryside considered an inveterate strife between families terminated in rather dramatic fashion. This feud had as its origin the deep injustice done by one family to George White . . .

[producer of the famous revue — the "Scandals"]

"I know audiences because I am often one of them . . . I know players because in most of my shows I take an active part. And I know the theatre because I am a producer.

"All three of me, therefore—spectator, actor and producer—would feel better if coughing in the theatre could be eliminated. But since coughers will always be with us, a good way to curb the evil is by giving audiences Smith Brothers' Cough Drops. And I, for one, am looking forward to the day when my chorus will toss S.B. cough drops over the footlights instead of flowers, confetti or candy kisses."

another, in years long before I was born. Throughout my boyhood there was a continual warfare between these two clans—bloodshed once, irremediable hatred always. . . . I remember that in school the girls of one house would never look at or speak to the boys of the other. To such limits go human folly and human sin.

When Christmas came, all this trouble gave a falsetto note to the otherwise joyous season. Finally came that Christmas:

At one o'clock on Christmas morning, while all the world lay dreaming in the silver light of moon and star, while the sense of the presence of the coming of Christ made the night holy, the head of one of the hostile clans stole from his house, passed down the silent village street, walked through a dim lane, and paused before a gate that he had not entered in forty years. Here he rapped loudly, and to his summons there was an immediate response. Uneasy lies the feudist.

The man at the gate was bareheaded, and he was unarmed. The man at the window had a high-powered rifle grimly gripped in his hands.

"John," said the midnight visitor, standing there in imminent peril of his life, "this is Christmas night, and I've come over to end all this business between us and our families."

"What do you mean by 'end it'?" the voice at the window asked suspiciously.

"Come down here, John. Let's shake hands and make up."

Ten minutes later the strange conference was over, and the feud was buried forever. The spirit of Christ, the spirit of Christmas, had prevailed. The next day our whole village rang with the glad news; and I have lived to see several really perfect marriages between those families which formerly had been implacable enemies.

CHRISTMAS, that blessed, frantic time of joyous and hectic excitement that we can associate with no other season of the year; Christmas, that cure of the heart's homesickness for love, is with us once again. Awakening in us spiritual joy, it seems to make all spiritual hope possible, all transcendent faith simple and natural and utterly certain.

From earliest childhood, this noble festival of Christmas has been my favorite; and I have long since formed my idea of an ideal one. Nor do I believe that, save in a few exterior details, it will differ from the ideal Christmas conceived by millions of other human hearts. But before telling what kind of Christmas I should like to put in everybody else's stocking, perhaps it would be well to make a declaration of faith; for whether we can in any degree celebrate this great festival aright depends in a critical measure upon the integrity of our belief. Being distinctly a religious commemoration, it can have no real meaning for the dismal heart of the atheist, who seems to imagine that the universe created itself. No man lacking a downright belief in the divine can ever feel Christmas. The superb "Adeste, Fideles" is a summons to the loyal to adore, not a general invitation to promiscuous revelry.

That marvelous life which began at Bethlehem we know to have been different from any other life ever passed upon this earth. It would be impossible to account for it save by acknowledging a miracle. The more experience in life we have, the more infallibly we learn to count on the certainty of the impossible. I believe in the Virgin Birth; I believe all the other miracles; I believe in the Resurrection. Nor is credence given merely for the supine reason of conformity, nor even of spiritual comfort. I accept Christ as divine because my reason and my instinct reject every other possible interpretation of Him. He cannot sensibly be classified with other sages and saints. He is a figure of solitary splendor. His greatness is not of this earth. His character is of that celestial quality to be communicable only from one spirit to another spirit.

And now once more we celebrate His birth.

CHRISTMAS is, however, a celebration which far antedates the birth of Christ. Long before Jesus was born, the ancients fixed upon December 25th, or thereabout, to signify the winter solstice. It was the turning point of winter and the beginning of spring. We have taken over, dignified, and spiritualized this pagan feast by making it Christmas; and perhaps our own Christmas takes on yet more meaning because of the little known fact that it has a natural significance of universal appeal, and a background of illustrious remoteness. We love the idea of the long inheritance, and in this instance we have done nobly by it; for we have taken an ancient heathen festival, and made it our chief religious celebration.

Because my traditions are Southern, I have always associated Christmas with the outdoors, and, as a result, with nature. Until I spent some winters in the North I had always supposed that the general arctic condition of things would prevent in midwinter a real communion with the field and the forest. But how often in this life do we learn that our opinions are wrong! I know now, and I love the beauty of a white Christmas. Perhaps there is a sleetstorm, when all the trees will glitter as if hung with crystal chandeliers. Perhaps a snow will sift down from the gray skies, magically piling pearly ridges on the fences, burdening the hemlocks and the pines, softly smothering the tawny dead grass and the patient little bushes.

There is an inviting loveliness in the snowy Christmas. There's a fascination in watching a snowstorm, especially one at Yuletide, that is unsurpassed by the charm of any other aspect of nature. Snow is beauty obliterating the world; its glamour is akin to that of moonlight, steeping the visible universe in radiant bloom. There is a power of gentleness that we seldom dream of; infinitely more effective than the mightiest blows from the hammer in the hands of Thor. Snow is gentleness, chaste as the mountain air, virginally cool, compassionately adorning the faded earth.

There's a wood of hemlock and pine close by my house in Pennsylvania where I now live, and when we have a white Christmas, nature decks scores of Christmas trees far more delicately and beautifully than can be adorned by human hands. And when night falls, these wild Christmas trees are hung with real stars. I remember gazing at a hemlock that wore Orion for a crown!

Many a Christmas Day I have spent in the wildwoods, in the mellow, delicious

Makes Life Sweeter

Children's stomachs sour, and need an anti-acid. Keep their systems sweet with Phillips Milk of Magnesia!

When tongue or breath tells of acid condition, it's time for Phillips Milk of Magnesia. Most men and women have been comforted by this universal sweetener—more mothers should invoke its aid for their children. It is a pleasant thing to take, yet neutralizes more acid than the harsher things too often employed for the purpose.

Phillips is the genuine, prescriptional product physicians endorse for general use. The name Phillips is important; don't buy a less perfect product and expect it to have the same perfect results.

sunshine of the Southern winter. I recall one day especially that so typically represents the charms of the outdoor Christmas of Dixieland that I wish it could be hidden in the toe of everyone's stocking!

By daybreak I was awakened by two voices of nature: A phœbe bird, that eerie little flute-player, was calling plaintively and persistently from the dead limb of a wild-orange tree just outside my window. The appeal of his song was drowsy, befitting the roseate misty air of the dim dawn. But after a few moments, as if to put to rout the phœbe's wistful, pathetic song, a gay Carolina wren began, in his wild ecstatic fashion, to carol madly from the garden fence. There is no resisting the infectious delight of such a spontaneous lyric; nor in all nature do I know a bird song so piercingly joyous.

I went to the window, and saw both tiny minstrels, Christmas choristers, each expressing his heart—one in a minor key, and one with robust optimism. The human hymn is nearly always the melody of these two tones.

AT HOME we always made much of the Christmas breakfast, for Christmas dinner would not be served until the candles were lighted for the evening. I went downstairs to a typical plantation dining-room: an immense old fireplace, wherein light-wood crackled redly under a huge live-oak backlog; where holly and smilax and mistletoe, gathered from the home woods, festooned the pictures and the frieze of stags' horns; where the negro servants, not unaware of the practical advantages of Christmas to them, moved about their duties with that abandoned excitement that is one of the privileges of this carnival of affection. . . .

Said one hungry man to another on a certain occasion: "Please don't mention anything good to eat, unless you have it with you." But this kind of breakfast is so different from that ordinarily served that perhaps it should be recorded. We had oranges—grown by a neighbor in his own front yard; cold sliced wild turkey and canvas-back duck; hominy, snowy and steaming; brown cornbreads made from white-flint corn; venison sausages; flapjacks about half an inch thick; fragrant coffee. I remember that we were breaking in a tiny negro boy to wait on the table. The ordeal was very hard on him. He bumped a plate of cornbread against my chair, dropped the plate, and forthwith vanished! He crawled under the table and snuggled up against my knees, where I could feel him palpitating.

After breakfast, we exchanged the simple Christmas gifts that we had; then I mounted my horse and went to ride the woods—real woods, too, where one may go forty miles without seeing a single human habitation save, perhaps, the humble cabin of some negro dweller in the pinelands. . . . To go into wastelands and wildernesses has always been a passion with me; and to be able to do so on Yuletide is an especial delight; for then, to the ordinary pleasure of observing the Green Mansions of God, there is added the consolation of religion—the feeling of infinite comfort, perhaps felt nowhere so certainly as on the flowering, fragrant breast of nature that "So God loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son to the end that all that believe in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

All that Christmas Day I roamed the sweet greenwood, breasting through aromatic myrtle thickets, passing under huge patriarch oaks, riding down the solemn aisles and the fabulous naves of the stupendous cathedral of the forest. . . . Wild things I saw in their beautiful home: shadowy deer, stately wild turkeys, flocks of bluebirds, chickadees, hosts of robins, and one superb illustrious eagle, soaring momentously in the far blue sky. . . .

It was sundown when I got home. Lights gleamed in the windows—windows that had welcomed me since earliest childhood days. The whole west behind me was redly magnificent. Along the river night had already begun to pitch her misty tents. . . .

After our Christmas dinner all of us came out on the broad porch to watch the stars and to listen to the far, sweet singing of the plantation negroes, breathed to us over the dewy starlit fields. . . . The night was radiant with constellations. They never mean so much to the mortal spirit as at that Holy Time.

That was a Christmas Day of birdsong, of the sacred and home-felt delight of family affection, of simplicity, of communion with the beauty of nature, of faith, of the quiet assurance through the loveliness and the order of the universe of the character of God. . . . It is the kind of Christmas I'd like to leave among everyone's other Yuletide gifts!

The Finest Christmas I Ever Spent

Prize Contest Announcement

CHRISTMASTIDE, with its warm spirit of fellowship, its renewal of old friendships, its generosity and jollity, is always an occasion to be remembered. But, looking back over all the fine Christmases you have spent, undoubtedly there is one that stands out high above the rest—a Christmas that had everything that Christmas should have, plus that something which made it memorable to you. Maybe it was the first reunion after the family had been separated for years; maybe it was when you took a bunch of poor youngsters into your home and gave them their first real Christmas; maybe it was when you got the one present in the world you wanted most.

It is always pleasant to recall good times, so write and tell us about the finest Christmas you ever spent.

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes December 20th. Winning letters will appear in the March, 1929, issue.

Address "Christmas" Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them.

Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

Ten Games That Will Give Life to Your Party

"A No. One" party-thrower to have, in addition to several of the short party stunts, a repertory of games of major importance, any one of which can be relied upon to save that awkward moment, or to take a party over the top when the deadly zero is reached.

And what is so ghastly to contemplate, whether host or guest, as the possibility of that frightful gap in the evening known as the "After-Dinner Breach"? This is especially menacing when the dinner is given before a dance. The dinner is over shortly after nine. No one dares show up at the dance until ten-thirty. The time spent en route will scarcely be over half an hour. There is nearly an hour to be accounted for. What to do?

ONE of the most successful devices for taking care of an emergency like this is "Lottery." We learned it from Sidney Lenz, the international champion at auction bridge. Briefly, it goes like this:

There are two decks of cards, one red and one blue—or other contrasting colors. The dealer can be selected by cutting or voting, if the host does not take the deal. The dealer takes up the red deck and shuffles it. From the top he deals out, face down, three cards in a row, which will later indicate the winner of the first three prizes. (This game can be played step by step by following these instructions.) The next three cards he puts in a second row for the booby prizes. There are now six cards on the table, face down. Then he puts the red deck aside.

The dealer picks up the blue deck and prepares to auction off the cards in little groups of three or five, or even a single card, to the highest bidder among the guests. Real money is involved, and a written record is kept by an assistant of the names of those bidding and the amounts bid.

Let us rush to say that this is not gambling: it is merely a redistribution of wealth. And, anyway, if anyone feels sensitive about it, it is perfectly permissible to name a pet charity and let the proceeds go to it. Or the game may proceed as we describe it.

"What am I bid for these three splendid cards?" the dealer asks. "Three cards with perhaps the lucky first prize among them! What am I bid?"

The bidding is brisk and exciting.

After the entire blue deck has been auctioned off to the players, the total amount bid for the cards is added up and divided into the prizes. The first three cards are the big prizes, and the second three are only for pennies, or, at most, something less than a dollar each. The players pay up, and the money is actually placed on the respective cards.

When all this has been done, the dealer picks up the forty-six cards left in the red deck, which he had put aside after laying out the six prize cards, and which are still face down and unknown. The tension is terrific. The dealer turns up the first card in the deck he now holds in his hand, the red deck. Let us say it is the Ten of Hearts.

"The Ten of Hearts," he announces. "Who has the Ten of Hearts?"

The person who holds in his hand the Ten of Hearts from the blue deck, discards it onto the table.

This proceeds, card by card, until only the six red cards lying on the table and the six blue duplicate cards held by the players, remain.

The dealer then turns up the red card on the table which has the lowest money value on it.

He announces what that card is, and the player who has the blue card to match it puts it down and collects the lowest booby prize.

The prize cards are turned up one by one until the highest of all the prizes is claimed by the lucky player, and the game is ended.

On those occasions where a group of people gathered together are verging toward topics of conversation dealing in caustic personalities, this tendency should be capitalized and legitimatized by playing the favorite game of Frank Crowninshield, editor of "Vanity Fair." It is called "Averages," and is fiendishly popular with such friends of his as the critics, Alexander Woollcott, Heywood Broun, Ruth Hale, and Robert Benchley; the novelists, Alice Duer Miller and Edna Ferber; the poet, Johnny Weaver; and Alma Gluck, the soprano.

TO PLAY "Averages," ten qualities are written down on two pieces of paper. One of these is given to the person elected, or volunteered, to be averaged, and one is for the crowd. The person to be averaged goes off by himself, and sincerely tries to rate himself on the qualities given him, on a basis of ten for perfect in each quality, and five, or perhaps less than five (as agreed on by all) for average.

While the victim is doing his self-appraising—in another room out of hearing—the crowd are averaging him, and doing it in perfectly good faith. The game is valuable only when it is played earnestly; it is then quite thrilling. One by one, those in the crowd individually express an opinion on each quality of the absent one in turn, and on each quality a mark is put down which is the average, or consensus, of their individual opinions. The person who is being averaged is called back to the room when all are finished, and asked his total mark. This he gives, and then hears what the crowd thinks of him. He is then asked, quality by quality, what he honestly rated himself on this and that, and is told in return for each what he was rated by his friends (?). The very danger of it all is what makes it so fascinating.

We have compiled special lists for the use of readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE who may be brave enough to risk playing this game.

Sometimes games of sheer nonsense are quite in order. There are other times, sunny and warm, when outdoor games are the only suitable thing. We know some excellent ones in each category; but with the long winter evenings coming on, and the short days, when we all work harder, games that entertain indoors will doubtless prove more useful here now.

We encountered a dandy, called "Getting Your Number." All those desiring to unstring their nervous systems may begin by sitting in a semicircle. Their chairs are numbered from one up to the number of those playing. It is the chair and not the player that is numbered; the player takes his number from that of the chair which he occupies.

Number One then begins quietly by calling the number of another chair represented in the series playing, say, "Four." The player in chair four must call another number without any delay. And so it goes until the wrong player answers, or a person calls out his own number, or until through fatigue of concentration, or general prostration, the player relaxes and fails to answer promptly.

When any one of these things happens, the player who fails goes to the bottom of the line and the other players all move up one place as far as the place left vacant by the demoted player. Those above that place stay where they are. Without pausing to recount, the game goes on, each player trying to remember his new number until carried, kicking, and screaming, and frothing at the mouth, violently out of the room. The object is to get to be Number One, and stay there.

THE great latent desire in all mortals to tell a story, or write a play, gets a magnificent outlet through two games that at first glance look somewhat alike. As a matter of fact, they are closely allied, although they are really quite different. One of these is called "Murder" and the other is called "Crime." "Murder" is the favorite game of Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York "World." The New York group most frequently found playing it together consists of such notable folk as Neysa McMein, the artist whose magazine covers are known everywhere; Alexander Woollcott, the dramatic critic; Robert Sherwood, F. P. A., the columnist of the Conning Tower in the "World"; Robert Benchley; George Kaufman, the playwright; and Harpo Marx, the comedian.

There is absolutely no cause to be alarmed over the scintillating sponsorship of this game, however, for we have tried it frequently, and with no small measure of success, in groups of less public eminence. One person is elected District Attorney, preferably someone with a good memory and a calm brain. Someone volunteers to report the murder. The person murdered should be known to those present though not actually one of the party. It is assumed that the murder has just been committed; that there can be no eye witnesses; and that the guilty one is among those present.

As soon as the murder is reported, the Ralph J. Daly, college-bred engineer, had made an excellent record at the University of Michigan—so satisfactory, in fact, that for three years he taught engineering at the University of Pennsylvania.

Seeking a greater opportunity, he gave up teaching for business—joined the Detroit Trust Company—but there he found himself doing little more than marking time.

Mr. Daly saw that he needed a grasp of business principles and methods which his college training had not supplied. He enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training in Higher Accountancy.

Today he is Secretary-Treasurer of the Detroit Fidelity and Surety Company—a position which he credits largely to the practical training which he got from LaSalle. "I feel that it was the one great factor," he writes, "which enabled me to find myself in the business world."

District Attorney orders all to be seated, as he is going to conduct an immediate investigation. He proceeds to get the story in detail and questions all the guests, as circumstances arise. Everything said in evidence must be admitted as the Truth. The guests must explain away, as best they can, all incriminating evidence that is brought against them. At the same time, it is up to the accused to plant evidence that will incriminate someone else.

The object is to build up a chain of circumstantial evidence so convincing that the guilt of one person is clearly established.

LET us suppose that we are the guests of Mr. Swope at his home on Long Island. We might take part in a game that would swing along something like this:

Miss McMein, in a state of great perturbation, reports the murder of the actress, Jane Cowl. Instantly, the guests are in an uproar, and Mr. Swope assumes his place as District Attorney.

"I am sorry, but no one can leave the room until this matter is fully investigated," he commands sternly. "Please be seated. Tell us in your own words, Neysa, just what you saw."

Miss McMein improvises carefully: "I felt a slight headache and thought that perhaps the fresh air would make me feel better. Fifteen minutes ago, I went out and walked down the drive. As I reached the gate, there, in the light of the electric lamp, I saw the lifeless form of Jane Cowl, lying in the road."

"In 'The Road to Rome'?" asks Mr. Woollcott, unable to resist a crack about Miss Cowl's success in Mr. Sherwood's play. He is promptly squelched, not only for making a poor jest, but because it is against the rules to kid the game which gets its biggest kick from being played seriously. However, the interruption gives Miss McMein an idea. She continues:

"I rushed forward, as soon as my first fright was conquered, and there I found a walking stick with the name of Alexander Woollcott engraved on the handle and an inscription, something about the esteem of the Actor's Equity, I could not make it out exactly because"—and here she shudders at the recollection—"because it was covered with blood."

She pauses, while all turn with an unavoidable animosity toward Mr. Woollcott. He tries to look jaunty and unimpressed. In reality, he is thinking hard.

"Is there anything else?" asks Mr. Swope.

"Yes. On my way in before dinner, I came in just behind Mr. Woollcott and Jane Cowl, who arrived together quarreling violently. I heard him threaten her. He had in his hand the cane I found by the body."

Mr. Swope fixes a baleful glance on the caustic dramatic critic. "Well, Woollcott, what have you to say for yourself?"

Mr. Woollcott may get himself out of this in any one of several ways. In doing so, he may resentfully try to incriminate Miss McMein, or he may aim his evidence at Robert Benchley, his deadly rival as the actors' favorite dramatic critic. As the game progresses, the players may suggest questions for Mr. Swope to ask, but no witness need answer any question not put to him or her by the District Attorney and no alibi can be offered, except when the player has been asked to testify.

Sometimes conflicting evidence is unintentionally introduced, but the District Attorney rules this out and sticks to the original evidence on that point. A knowledge of the law is not at all necessary. Imagination is the essential qualification. You must bear in mind that the game is an investigation, not a trial.

In "Crime" two detectives are chosen and sent out of the room. The remainder of the party plan a crime, such as the theft of a necklace, and decide on who committed it and how it was committed. The evidence is agreed on and planted around the room. After the detectives are once called in on the case, none of the evidence can in any way be altered by the players.

When all have fixed in mind the plan of the crime, the detectives are called in. They are told of the robbery, and may then quizz anyone in the room. They may establish the identity of those present, who, for instance, is maid, butler, husband, guest, and so on. They may search for traces of evidence and clues. A little mud on the soles of a shoe might indicate that the wearer had been out of doors, and that in itself might lead to the solution of the crime.

The detectives cannot seize and search anyone unless they first show convincing reason for its necessity. They then can ask the suspected person whether he has the stolen article on him, and that person must answer with perfect honesty, "Yes," or "No." The apprehension of the thief and the recovery of the stolen article ends the game.

AN OUTDOOR game that satisfies all the healthy instincts to yell, perspire, and harass your opponent, is "Keeley-Eye-Over." This game is sometimes referred to as "Aunty Over the House." All those who wish to exhaust themselves in it divide into two sides. Between them must be an opaque obstruction such as a wall, hedge, shed, or garage. Shouting the warning cry of "Keeley-Eye Over," a player on one side throws a tennis ball over the shed or wall toward the players on the other side. These try to catch it. It is not necessary to catch it, but it saves time. When one player gets the ball into his hands, he runs around the obstruction and tries to hit one of his opponents with it while they are scattering. If he succeeds in getting one of them, that player is captured and must return to the other side and play with them. But if he misses the misser must stay with his opponents. Each side takes turns throwing the ball over the house. The object is to get all the players on one side, and that side wins.

ARCHIBALD RUTLEDGE'S article next month gives you delightful glimpses of wild life, showing how the feathered and furred mothers instill the ancient and necessary virtue of obedience into the heads and hearts of their frisky babies. "Almost daily," says Mr. Rutledge, "wild creatures are called upon to make life and death choices; and they usually choose with celerity and wisdom . . . their mothers taught them to do so."

"Three Big Things I Learned from My Father"

the best gentlemen drivers of trotting horses in New York. As often as possible he used to come up from the office to drive in Central Park before dark. Frequently one of us children would accompany him; and I recall how keenly he enjoyed a lively brush in the park with his brother William, or some friend with a fast horse.

"It is very vivid in my mind how other drivers would sometimes lose their tempers when their horses broke or pulled hard. But I cannot remember that Father ever did this. If a horse was excitable or difficult, he always kept his temper, and patiently, quietly, worked with the animal until he had it under control.

"I have observed him under all kinds of circumstances, concerned and serene, wrestling with difficult problems, happy in their solution. His temperament never changed. He has always been calm, deliberate, fair, kindly.

"It was his superb self-control that most impressed me at the time when I was first called to the witness stand. He had always been regarded as an extraordinary witness; I knew I could not hope to equal him. One thing I determined, however, that I could, and would, do as he did, and that was to keep my temper, and I did. Self-control is the very basis of coöperative and constructive relations with one's fellows.

I SOMETIMES think of my father as a man who can wait longer and with greater patience than any other man I have ever known. I have heard him say in connection with some problem we were discussing that the course we had decided upon was right and would work out, though we might have to wait twenty-five years or more for the final results.

"Nor have I ever known Father to be resentful. Though he was bitterly attacked for his part in inaugurating the corporate form of business which is so widespread today, he was never perturbed. The course he had entered upon his judgment and conscience approved, and he was willing to weather any storm, waiting with the utmost patience for the just appraisal which he knew would ultimately come.

"It has happened at times that in talking over with me the ingratitude of someone whom he had helped, or in speaking of an injustice which someone had done him, he would express himself with the vigor of a man disappointed and roused; but always he would turn quickly from such feelings, and say that we must not judge that person, for we could not know what difficulties, what disappointments, what bitterness he had suffered.

"I recall that on one of our trips to Europe, the courier whom Father had engaged before going abroad cheated him outrageously. When he had accumulated adequate evidence of this, Father said to the courier, mildly and pleasantly, that thereafter he himself would pay all the bills. Instantly, the courier replied, 'In that case, Mr. Rockefeller, you will have no further need of my services.' In the same friendly manner, Father accepted the man's resignation, paid him in full, and secured a release from him for the unexpired period for which he had been engaged. Of course the man was bluffing when he suggested that he would no longer be needed, but the bluff was so pleasantly called that before he knew it he had signed his own discharge.

"After this dismissal of the courier Father worked very hard in managing the party. I can see him now, going over the long French bills, studying each item, many of them unintelligible to him. Coming to an item in the bill which he did not understand, he would turn to me and ask what poulets were. Or again, he might say, 'Bougies! Bougies! What in the world is a bougie, John?' And so on down the bill.

"Father never has been willing to pay a bill which he did not know to be correct in all its items. Such care in small things might seem penurious to some people; yet it was the working out of a life principle, and a big nature was coupled with it. It was the same when as a boy he was employed as a bookkeeper. He verified every item in each bill to make sure that the addition was right, so that his employers might not be cheated or subjected to loss through carelessness.

"Thus I came to realize that extreme carefulness has been one of the foundation stones of my father's success. Care in small details is not necessarily pettiness. On the contrary, it may be due to an unwillingness to shirk any responsibility."

I ASKED Mr. Rockefeller if he thought that the simple methods by which he was brought up as a boy were applicable by fathers and mothers today. "Yes, with some modification," he replied. "We are applying them with our own children." (He has six, of whom five are sons; and one of these is now in Princeton and another in Dartmouth.) "However, I think I must admit that with the diversions and distractions of automobiles, motion pictures, radio and the like, the problem of the rearing of children is more complicated than when I was young."

And here, in condensed form, I am going to append certain further remarks made by Mr. Rockefeller on the problem of child rearing, for I think that many fathers and mothers will want to discuss them:

The essence of the problem, it seems to me, is this: that the will of the parents should not be arbitrarily imposed upon the child. Until the age of eight or ten, it is impossible to discuss the reason for many things, but after that parental guidance can increasingly take the form of discussion and suggestion.

Children should be helped to form the habit of doing things for themselves—things that need to be done—whether they like to do them or not. I think that many children of today are not developing the will power and self-mastery that are essential in the solution of life's problems.

My father had to chop wood and do the milking. He probably didn't like doing the chores any better than most boys, but he acquired the habit of doing the things he did not like to do. His will was trained, and it helped him cope with other difficulties.

It is essential that children should know what to spend, how to spend, what things cost, whether a thing is worth buying; in short, the value of money.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

This, and keeping accounts, is important because of the principle underlying. It is of value to any child to hold to the rigid fundamental principles of economics.

At seven or eight, my children each received an allowance of thirty cents a week. The understanding was that out of it they were to save and to give as well as to spend.

I explained the importance of keeping accounts. At the end of the week I audited the accounts. A few years later they were getting a dollar a week, and to teach accuracy in keeping accounts rewards and demerits were given. If the account book was correct the child got $1.05 the following week, $1.10 the next and so on; if incorrect, only 95 cents, then 90, and 85.

Education used to mean cramming the mind. Education really is learning to use the mind; and the child should be taught as early as possible to grapple with the problems of his own little world.

I believe it is a good thing for any boy to work his way up from the bottom. I have sometimes regretted that I did not have that sort of chance, and covet it for my boys.

BACK in 1917, soon after the United States had entered the war, the elder Rockefeller contributed through the Rockefeller Foundation many millions of dollars to help toward the victory. Following this event, his son was appointed chairman of the United War Work Campaign for Greater New York.

In this capacity he had the responsibility of raising thirty-five millions of dollars of the one hundred and seventy millions which was sought throughout the United States. Subscriptions came up to within seven or eight millions of the amount required, and then lagged.

It was at this juncture, as you may recall in view of the many newspaper stories at the time, that the Rockefellers, father and son, jointly guaranteed that five million dollars would be forthcoming from them if necessary to make up Greater New York's total. One question I asked Mr. Rockefeller had to do with the circumstances of this guarantee. His answer is particularly interesting in the light of what I have told you about his father's carefulness in small things. Here, in contrast with the courier incident narrated above, we have one showing his generosity in large affairs. It brings to my mind that old rule which says that if we take care of the little things the big ones will take care of themselves.

"Toward the close of the campaign when subscriptions were lagging," observed Mr. Rockefeller, in answer to my question, "I felt that if we could get a guarantee of the last five millions, this guarantee, added to the subscriptions still to come in, might be expected to carry the campaign to its goal. With the hope of getting them to join in underwriting the five millions I went to several men of large means. These men felt that they had given all that they could. Then it began to look as though the last five millions might not be covered.

"At length, one morning before breakfast, when I was in despair lest the goal set might not be reached, I telephoned my father, who happened to be at Lakewood, New Jersey. Having laid the situation before him, I asked if he would join with me in guaranteeing the necessary sum. I told him that I confidently expected that, if the guarantee could be secured, the amount would largely be taken care of by general subscriptions; but that, on the other hand, the guarantors might be called upon to pay heavily, or even all.

"Apparently Father realized how hard I had been working for the success of the movement; that I had come to him only as a last resort, and that I was reluctant, not only because of the war need, but also for the reputation of the family, to fail in the accomplishment of the task. He asked me only one question—whether I thought it was all right, and when I answered yes, he said, in his quiet, reassuring way, which fills me with confidence and makes the impossible seem almost easy, that he would back me to any extent.

"That was all there was to it. I was so overcome by the bigness of his spirit in lifting the burden from my shoulders, and by his limitless confidence in me that all I could do was to thank him, with a lump in my throat, and hang up the receiver."

Subsequently, the five millions covered by this guarantee was largely made up from pledges and later subscriptions, so that the guarantors were called upon to pay only between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

I have already spoken of the plain simplicity of the elder Rockefeller's character. Instead of simplicity, I might have used the word "humility." Some years ago, when he was asked by a member of his family to sit for two portraits to be done by the famous portrait painter Sargent, he inquired, before consenting, what the expense would be. Feeling that the sum mentioned was very large, the elder Rockefeller demurred, pointing out that among his friends in Westchester County were a number of artists who would be glad to undertake the work for five hundred dollars. "Why should I have my portrait painted by this expensive artist?" he asked. "What have I done? It happens that I have made a lot of money, to be sure; but there are many others who have done as much." However, when it was brought home to him that the members of his family particularly desired him to sit for this famous artist, he withdrew his objections, permitting his son to arrange for the portraits and at the latter's expense.

STRANGE as it may seem to most of us, though John D. Rockefeller has given more than fifty million dollars to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, an enterprise devoted to making the lot of his fellow men happier and healthier, he has seldom been inside any of the buildings of this institution. Some years ago, when father and son were walking up Fifth Avenue, the junior Rockefeller suggested that if his father would care to inspect these buildings, which up to that time he had never seen, he would be glad to show them to him.

In consequence, the elder Rockefeller made his first trip to the East Side at Sixty-fifth Street, where the institute is located. Here, father and son stood on the sidewalk, and the various buildings, the administration building and the laboratories, were pointed out to the donor by his son. Only one question was asked by the elder Rockefeller at the time—whether the buildings had proved properly suited to the purposes for which they were intended. When asked if he might not care to go inside and inspect them, he said that he did not think so. Thereupon, with no one associated with the institute any the wiser concerning this visit, father and son unostentatiously got into their taxicab and went home.

No one who knows of the intense interest with which the elder Rockefeller has followed the far-reaching activities of this great institution can suspect for a minute that this incident betrays a lack of concern for its achievements. Here we see the attitude of a man interested not in a plant by which results are achieved, but in the main thing—the results. Incidentally, it seems to me that he was living up to a maxim once coined by him out of a vast experience:

"The true economy of life, I have learned, is to find the man who can do a particular thing, and then leave him to do it unhampered."

In nothing that I have ever heard or read about the elder Rockefeller have I come upon an instance when his conduct or utterance seemed tinged with boastfulness. On the other hand, he has frequently depreciated his own achievements. Once, when asked the secret of his success, he said:

"The time and chances then were favorable. Then everything accumulated for us. One did not need to know much."

"But," it was suggested, "there were many who at the same favorable time did not reach their objectives."

"I never thought I would get this far," was the response. "Of course there are always a few who hold the entire structure together."

AT THIS moment there flashes into my mind a scene that took place in March, 1928, when the elder Rockefeller was spending the winter at Ormond Beach, Florida. Over the sparkling hills, along the edge of the palms and great pines, the morning sun was shining. A group of golfers moved across the green. All gathered in suspense around one player. How carefully he aimed at the distant hole as a gloved hand tightened on his club! Then he swung, and the next instant all were applauding; and the player himself lifted his arms high in the air, happy and care-free, ready to embrace the world in gratitude for his long-distance, lucky shot. Presently, in a somewhat expansive mood, the plain country gentleman from Pocantico discussed with a visitor some of his fundamental ideas on longevity, thrift—life. These utterances, pungent, maxim-like, oracular, together with certain observations made during the course of the years, may be accepted, I think, as the kernels of John D. Rockefeller's philosophy, which, however, so far as I know, has never been formally expounded:

Do not attempt to grow old before your time. Maintain an interest in life, and in all living things.

There is no feeling in this world, I think, comparable to that of self-reliance, without which we can do nothing. Do not sacrifice it to anything else.

Persevere. If you make mistakes, remember that it is only human to err; but try again and try harder.

Golf is the best exercise with which to rid one's self of one's balance of vanity.

I advise every man to save.

Live within your means. One of the swiftest toboggans I know of is prepared for the young man, just starting in life, who goes into debt.

I think it is a man's duty to make all the money he can and to give all he can.

When I was fourteen years old, and working ten hours a day for a farmer and always saving small sums, I learned that in twelve months I could get as much interest for fifty dollars lent at seven per cent—the legal rate in New York at that time—as I could earn digging potatoes ten days. The impression gained ground with me that it was a good thing to let the money be my slave, and not make myself the slave of money.

I have tried to remember that in every sense money is a good thing, if we know how to use it properly; but harmful to many people, because they do not know how to use it properly.

Children must be taught the right attitude toward money. They must learn to earn it themselves. That is what I am trying to teach my grandchildren.

A clear conscience is a greater comfort and worth more than a great fortune gathered by dishonorable methods.

When I was young, I sought nothing else but the opportunity to work.

I once knew a very rich man who did not have the capacity to give. He said it was physically impossible for him to open his hand. Therefore, he was a poor man.

To give is an art. To give to everybody who asks is an injustice, because often in this fashion one takes it away from a more deserving one.

Yes; I am lucky that there are times when I can say "No." I pray to God that He may always give me enough sense to find the right people—those who really deserve it.

LUCK! THERE IS PLENTY OF IT going the rounds. The question is how to match it up with the time, the place, and the man. Next month, Irving Bacheller, in a series of pithy anecdotes, shows how several noted men made luck synchronize with their circumstances, and bent it to their purpose. You will learn something from Mr. Bacheller's article, just as he learned from the famous men about whom he writes.

this time for damages due to a fall down a stairway, the plaintiff's witnesses swore the stairs were dark as a pocket. The defendant produced six witnesses who swore emphatically they were lighted by a window at the top. I called an automobile and took all the witnesses to the house. The plaintiff and his witnesses stepped up to one doorway; the defendant and his witnesses stepped up to the doorway of the house adjoining. The defendant owned both of the houses and had been mistaken in the one in which the accident had occurred.

"Several years ago a young couple appeared before me. She was a pretty little spitfire with flashing eyes and a spunky tilt to her chin. He was a six-footer, a good, clean-cut young fellow, but just as independent as she was. The wife accused the husband of deserting her and their baby. The husband accused the

What Are YOUR Mistakes in English?

They may offend others as much as these offend you

IF some one you met for the first time made the mistakes in English shown above, what would you think of him? Would he inspire your respect? Would you be inclined to make a friend of him? Would you care to introduce him to others as a close friend of yours?

These errors are easy for you to see. Perhaps, however, you make different mistakes which offend other people as much as these would offend you. How do you know that you do not mispronounce certain words; are you always sure that the things you say and write are grammatically correct? To you they may seem correct, but others may know that they are wrong.

Unfortunately, people will not correct you when you make mistakes; all they do is to make a mental reservation about you. "He is ignorant and uncultured," they think.

FREE BOOK ON ENGLISH Sherwin Cody, perhaps the best known teacher of practical English, has perfected and patented a remarkable device which will quickly find and correct mistakes you unconsciously make. Correct English soon becomes a HABIT.

Mr. Cody's remarkable new invention, the 100% Self-Correcting Method, has already improved the English of more than 50,000 persons. No useless rules, no tedious copying, no hard study. Only 15 minutes a day required.

A new book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English," is ready. It explains Mr. Cody's surprisingly easy method. Get a copy free and learn how to stop making embarrassing errors. You do not want others to judge you unfairly. Merely mail the coupon or a postal card. SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH, 912 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

wife of owning a private mail box and of being in love with another man.

"'What are you going to do about it?' I asked.

"'He's impossible,' snapped the wife. 'I intend to divorce him at once.'

"'And as far as I'm concerned,' spoke up the husband, 'she can get a dozen divorces. I'm through.'

"'How long have you been married?' I inquired.

"'Almost two years.'

"'Then, less than two years ago,' I said, 'each of you believed that the other was the finest, sweetest person in all the world, the one person with whom you cared to spend the remainder of your life. If you were mistaken then, how do you know that you are not mistaken now?'

"'She's in love with another man!' stormed the husband.

"'I'm not in love with him!' retorted the wife. 'I—I—'

"THE tears began to come. The husband squirmed and twisted his hat. By and by the real story came out, just as I had it before me on my private report.

"One day, quite by accident, the husband had opened a letter addressed to his wife. It was an unimportant, inconsequential letter which she admitted she would have shown him anyway. But she was convinced he had opened it purposely and started a rumpus. Whereupon he asserted that he'd open all her letters, just to show her who was who in that house.

"The wife's counter to this was the rental of a private mail box at the nearby branch post office. She made no secret of the rental. On the contrary, she gloried in it. The husband now began to suspect that his wife did have some reason for being so particular about her mail. He smelled a rival.

"Now, there really wasn't any rival. Most all of the wife's relatives and friends lived in the city, and she received but few letters, and those were in handwriting familiar to her husband. To remedy this situation and further arouse her husband's jealousy, the wife began a harmless flirtation with a young salesman. Of course, when the salesman was out of town he promised to write to her, and it happened he was out of town most of the time. One of his letters, left purposely where the husband would find it, started that couple headlong toward the divorce court. Fortunately, because of the child, they had to make a detour through me, and they found the mole hill under their mountain.

"It's these little things which smash bones," repeated Judge MacNeille. "In another case the trouble started over the husband picking his teeth with a penknife after meals. He was stubborn, so was his wife. One thing led to another, and before they saw how foolish they were they found themselves in court. Another husband wore spats, which his wife detested. A third left his false teeth on the buffet. A fourth snored his wife into irritability; a fifth forgot the date of his mother-in-law's birthday, not once, but persistently; and a sixth balked at wax-pointing his mustache in emulation of another man his wife admired.

"All of these cases came to court, and several of them resulted in divorce. An unwillingness to sacrifice or, to put it bluntly, selfishness, is the cause of nine out of every ten rows.

"Very often it is an obvious selfishness, even an admitted selfishness. I have in mind a splendid young couple with two charming children. He was an actor and she an artist. Their divorce action was already under way. They wanted me to find a home for the children.

"'You mean that you wish these children put out among strangers, into an institution?' I demanded.

"'That's the only solution,' said the husband sadly. 'I can't take care of them, for my profession prevents it. My wife won't.'

"'I have my career,' defended the wife.

"I suggested that at the worst they could send the children to a private school, or at least give them over to some relative. The mother did not want them in a school because, in the final analysis, she still would be responsible for them. She added that no relative cared to take them.

"'But, madam,' I argued, 'these are your children, your own flesh and blood. Does a career mean more to you than they do? Can you say that it does, as their mother?'

"She looked me straight in the eye. 'It does!' she said. 'It wouldn't be fair to those children to leave them in my charge. I won't jeopardize my career for them.'

"They got their divorce. We took care of the children, at the husband's expense. I know of no more cold-blooded example of selfishness, and I've seen more than the average man's share of it. Many such cases would soon destroy one's faith in human nature if there were not examples in contrast. Fortunately, there are.

"Go on," I urged.

"IT WAS another family, of seven children. The father was a sailor and away from home for weeks at a time. The mother was in a hospital suffering with an incurable disease, which left the disposition of the children to us. A neighbor woman, an old friend of the mother, asked us to let her care for the three smallest youngsters and the oldest, who was a girl of fourteen in high school. The remaining three were sent to a farm for children in central Pennsylvania.

"Several months went by. To my surprise one morning I noticed the case of the family listed again.

"'I thought we had disposed of that family,' I remarked to a social worker who had originally handled the case. 'What's the trouble now?'

"'None,' the social worker explained. 'It's simply this: The eldest girl, who, by the way, hopes some day to be a lawyer, is here this morning to ask you to place all of the children with this neighbor who has been caring for the four. Personally, I think it is too much, and I am opposed to making any change.'

"'We'll hear the case anyway,' I said.

"References to records at my elbow told me that the neighbor had a modest, good, Christian home. She was a widow, already had reared a fine family of four boys, who had married and were doing well. A small income came to her from her husband's estate and her sons also contributed to her support. She was a practical, capable, motherly woman. The one claim the children had upon her was that she was their mother's friend.

"The fourteen-year-old girl presented the case. The ablest attorney could not have done better.

"'We want to be together, as we were before Mother was taken sick,' she said simply. 'Father says he will give us nearly all of his wages. Mrs. Crane says that she loves us and wants to have us. It isn't right to keep us apart, Your Honor, when it is possible for us to be together. Those you have sent to the farm are our own brothers and sister, and they want to be with us, in one home.'

"'Do you want them?' I asked Mrs. Crane. 'You are doing more than your share now. Do you want to do more?'

"'Yes, Judge, I'd like to have them,' she said. 'They are good children. I have an empty bedroom up-stairs. There's plenty of room for all of us.'

"'We can help one another,' broke in the girl. 'I can do much of the work myself before and after school.'

"When I told her that her argument was unanswerable and that her brothers and sister would be returned to her, she burst into tears. Would that we had more Mrs. Cranes!

"THERE is such a thing, however, as too much sacrifice by parents. This was the case of a bright, active, handsome lad just entering his teens. His parents worshiped him. Their whole lives were wrapped up in that boy.

"That he might be dressed as well as other children, these poor folks gave up every little pleasure, and even denied themselves sufficient food. They had come here as immigrants and had had little schooling. Their knowledge of English and of American ways was limited. The result was inevitable; the boy became ashamed of his parents.

"At home he played the tyrant. On the streets he ran wild, and quickly became the leader of a trouble-making gang that began to terrorize the neighborhood. The parents became alarmed and begged the boy to change his ways. He answered by laughing at their ignorance, their poor clothes, and their broken speech. One day, after an escapade more serious than his others, he landed in my court. With him came his fear-stricken father and mother. The father begged that he be sent to jail in place of the boy.

"'Have you ever punished this boy?' I demanded of him.

"The father protested that he had never so much as lifted a finger against him. 'The law of this country prohibits it,' he said through the interpreter.

"'Oh, no, it doesn't,' I told him. 'The law of this state doesn't prohibit any parent from disciplining his child as long as he does it in a reasonable manner and doesn't injure the child.'

"'Then,' stammered the father, 'I—I'll whip him.'

"We sent a probation officer home with them to see that the whipping didn't exceed humane bounds. I've said he was a bright boy. That whipping, reluctantly given as it was, woke him up. For the first time he saw the love of his parents and realized what they had been doing for him. Almost overnight he became a different boy.

"The gang of which he was leader voluntarily broke up and reformed, largely through his influence. Today he is helping his parents instead of holding them in contempt.

"I don't believe in corporal punishment as a rule. With children properly reared it is seldom necessary. But I would rather order a boy whipped by his parents than order him sent to a reform school where a keeper would wield the rod. When a whipping will save a boy it becomes a duty to see that he gets it, but it should be inflicted by one who has the proper love for him. The moral rather than the physical lash is what most hurts.

"In another case a bunch of boys was arrested for throwing stones at a passenger train as it passed—a very serious offense likely to lead to the permanent injury of someone on the train. One of the fathers bitterly denounced the railroad detective who had made the arrest.

"'He don't know boys,' the father complained irately. 'Just because a boy doesn't know any better, he isn't a criminal.'

"'You're right,' I said to the father, 'the boy isn't criminal, but you are! You are criminally negligent in the upbringing of your boy. He should know better, and you are the one who should have taught him. If these boys are not punished now I don't know what may become of them.'

"'I've ordered mine to stay at home for thirty days,' spoke up another father. 'And I'll be responsible for his conduct hereafter.'

"'That's a good sentence,' I decided. 'I'll sentence every one of these boys to thirty days' confinement at home. They may go to school, and get one hour of exercise each afternoon after school in the company of you fathers. The remainder of the time they are to stay in the house. And,' I added, 'during those thirty days you fathers had better do something in the way of constructive thinking. You can't keep a healthy, normal boy out of mischief by walling him in with blind "don'ts." Give him some "do's".'

"I MEAN that for girls as well as boys. The adage about all work and no play making Jack a dull boy applies just as well to Jill. Nine out of ten of the youngsters who have been brought up before me were the victims of parental ignorance. They had been told not to do this and not to do that, but what they might do had been left to their imagination.

"A few years ago a certain congested district in Philadelphia was sending up to this court an average of ten and a dozen boys a week. We got busy and had a playground put in that district, equipped it with the kinds of things boys and girls like, and put in charge some people who know children. Within six months the number of juvenile cases dropped to one a week. Today we seldom get a case from that district.

"Another difficulty with parents is that they set a high standard of conduct for their children, but fail to live up to it themselves. They forget that youth learn by example rather than by precept. Untold hundreds send their children to Sunday-school, and themselves never go near church.

"The basis of the home is love, and the basis of love is respect. The two must go together, whether it be between man and wife or between parents and children. The child is the keenest judge on this earth of those traits of character which do command respect, and the child is the quickest to react to those traits which don't!"

"WHAT," I asked, "is the most important problem in home-making?"

Judge MacNeille brought his fist down on the desk with considerable emphasis. "Real marriage!" he replied. "We don't need new divorce laws. We do need new marriage laws. And we need more old-fashioned, godly parents!

"Not long ago a father and mother came before me with their daughter and a young man. They were what we call 'good people.' Anyway, they lived in one of the best sections of the city, had an automobile, chauffeur, and servants, were regular attendants at the opera, and all of that. The daughter was eighteen; the youth with her, nineteen. They were charged with having run away and spending several nights at a hotel as man and wife.

"'We are man and wife,' declared the daughter. She produced her marriage certificate to prove it.

"'She is a minor and so is he,' spoke up the father. 'The marriage must be annulled.'

"'Have you ever sat down with this girl and talked with her seriously about marriage?' I demanded.

"'Not directly,' the father admitted. 'But she has been given the best of training. We have sent her to the finest private schools.'

"'Yes,' I interrupted, 'you spent plenty of money to send her away to school—that was easy to do. But if you and her mother had spent some time on your daughter, and had opened your hearts as well as your purse to her, she never would have rushed off into the most important contract of her life without consulting you.

"'But the damage is done. They're married. My advice to you is to let the marriage stand. If you think you have done your duty by your daughter, you should be content with the choice she has made. If she has failed in that choice it is because you have failed as parents.'

"The young man spoke up then. He wanted an order upon his father-in-law for his bride's clothes. I informed him he would get no such order. 'Either you will get yourself work and buy her clothes, and support and love her as you pledged yourself to do, or I'll give you work on a stone pile,' I threatened. 'Now, get out, get a home, and try to make a go of it. Show this girl's people that you are a man!'

"I DON'T know how they will make out. It is too early to tell yet. But I do know that three fourths of our divorces are the consequences of too hasty marriage or lack of parental instruction before marriage.

"'I believe a boy twenty-one years old is competent to pick his own wife,' one father declared to me heatedly. The boy had picked, but picked wrongly.

"'Would you consider a boy of that age competent to set himself up in a business venture without your advice?' I inquired.

"'That's different,' he replied.

"But is it different? A business failure is nothing worse than a chance to start again fortified by experience. A failure in marriage, on the other hand, with its attendant bitterness, homeless children, and harmful effect upon public morals is a blight that frequently ends only in the grave. If parents took the same care in preparing their children for home life as they do for business and social life, we wouldn't be worrying over the divorce evil today.

"Understand, I am not disapproving of early marriages. Many of them turn out all right. But it might be well for the law to make a legal requirement that at least five days elapse between the issuance of a marriage license and the actual performance of the contract. Even such a small check as this would save untold unhappiness and regrets.

"I have in mind a young man of good family, brilliant, but a little wild. He met a girl at a party. As soon as she discovered who he was she schemed with her family to marry him. They got him drunk. When he sobered up it was to find that he was a husband. That happened a good many years ago. Today he is an eminent citizen. But the shadow of that old mistake, which a delay would have prevented, still stalks at his side in the form of a worthless son.

"No," the judge went on meditatively, "we don't need new divorce laws. No law should tie two people together when they have only disgust for each other: that is enslavement. If their own religious and personal principles can't hold them together that home must go on the rocks. What we do need is a few generations of campaigning among parents to teach them their duty. Not one family in a thousand seriously discusses marriage with its children. Marriage should be no hit-or-miss affair. It takes time, thought, and trouble to get thoroughly married, and it is up to parents to see that their children are trained to make a permanent job of it. Nowadays far too many young people are doing their courting in the automobile seat and on the park bench, because the bridge parties of their elders have crowded them out of the home parlor."

THE "Poor Man's Court," or "Court of Arbitration," was the joint conception of Judge MacNeille and officials of the Philadelphia Department of Welfare. Its sessions are held in the evening whenever twenty or twenty-five cases have accumulated. There is no jury. Lawyers are permitted, but not invited, and seldom come except as spectators. In advance, each of the litigants signs an agreement to let the court arbitrate his difference, which binds him legally to accept the verdict without appeal. No fees are exacted. Judge and attendants alike conduct the court in their spare time and receive no pay for services.

"WHY ARE JEWS LIKE THAT?" Lewis Browne, brilliant Jewish scholar, former rabbi, and author of "This Believing World," answers that question next month. With frankness and sincerity, he explains the Jew to the Gentile. His article is sparkling, clean-cut and keenly analytical—as fine an explanation of Jewish characteristics as you are likely ever to read.

Are You Ever Ashamed of Your English?
DO YOU say "who" when you should say "whom"? Do you say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me"? Do you mispronounce common words in your speech or use them incorrectly when you write?
Many a man has been held down all his life because of mistakes in English.
You do not need to make these mistakes any longer. Right at home, in the privacy of your own room, you can make up the education you missed in the days when you should have been at school.
The International School of English will teach you, just as it has taught thousands of other men and women, by a simple new method which shows you instinctively which word to use and how to use it.

in the other room and play with the trains. Jennie, take the baby upstairs, will you, please?"

She was beginning to organize the morning with a burst of energy taken from some reserve store, when Frank's talk over the telephone arrested her attention.

"As bad as that?" he was saying. "Did I do that? It never occurred to me. I knew I had lots of oil, you see. Well, if you've got to, you've got to. Can't get at it today, I suppose? . . . Well, rush it tomorrow. A doctor has to have a car. Could you rent me one? . . . Sure, send a boy right out with it. . . . That's fine. I'll drop in tomorrow and see how the old car looks. Don't do more than is necessary."

He turned away from the telephone and found Mary at his elbow, haggardly waiting for calamity.

"What happened was that the oil pump froze up, and in trying to force those gears and drive as far as we did, I seem to have bent the transmission shaft and burned out some of the bearings. It's quite a mess."

"When something happened to the bearings on the old car, it cost more than a hundred dollars," she said, delving into memory and coming up aghast.

"Can't help it now. It's Christmas. Let's forget it!"

"But where's the money coming from, Frank? The Christmas bills will be coming in, and you have insurance in January. And everything!"

"Come," he said, in his usual phrase, "you're tired out. Wait and see what you get for Christmas."

SOUNDS of stress came from the living-room, where the two children were playing. The doctor, welcoming distraction, went in to see what was happening. Mary returned to the kitchen, where the sight of the big turkey seemed to be a reproach now. Why hadn't she got chickens? Why had she bought so many things? What were they going to charge for that car? And why was Frank so terribly easy-going? He was going to work himself to death, and that would be the end.

The telephone began to ring furiously. Someone wanted to talk to the doctor at once. It was serious. Mary called Frank and went back to her work. These hysterical women always thought it was serious. She heard Frank talking to Doctor Allerby, and then he looked in on her to call a quick good-by and hurry out to where the car was waiting for him—the expensive hired car.

It was Christmas morning; but when Mary looked again at her living-room it seemed a tumbled place. The mystery of the night before was gone. Dust slanted in on the over-bright sunlit rays. In the heat of the radiators the cedar wreaths were beginning to curl up their edges, and the children's toys, scattered over the floor, looked tawdry.

The children themselves were already disheveled, their white stockings, which she had hoped would do for the day, dirty at the knees. Where had they been and what were they doing? She heard herself speaking sharply to them, and was instantly miserable that she had done so. Christmas was no time for irritation.

For two hours she hurried, disposing of all the tiny obstacles that love to breed in each other's train. The table had to be lengthened with extra boards, and then she found that the silence pad which was to go under the cloth had shrunk in the washing, and was not quite long enough. Two smaller pads had to be used instead. Jennie found the whipping cream had tipped over in the ice box and only a cupful of it could be salvaged, too little to make the dressing Mary had wanted for the salad molds. The turkey seemed to be overfat, and began to drip yellow grease too profusely as it roasted.

And the narcissuses which Mary had bought for a center-piece—with four pink roses, because Christmas wasn't Christmas without roses—were no sooner taken out of their box and put on the table than they began to droop a little. She tried salt and aspirin, but they were not spirited flowers, and nothing could make them so.

THERE was something else that kept bothering her. The Allerbys had sent them a Christmas card, and nothing more—one of those very expensive engraved Christmas greetings which enclose an etching of a pine tree in a parchment envelope. That seemed to Mary just another symptom of the little regard in which the elder doctor held his colleague.

Her temper and hurt pride rose together as she thought of the hours she had spent hunting for a suitable present for the Allerbys. She had found one, a volume of Chinese travels with beautiful decorations; but it had cost fifteen dollars. Frank had insisted that it wasn't a bit too much, and, remembering that last year the Allerbys had sent them a case of Christmas records for the phonograph, Mary had bought the book.

It wasn't that she wanted value in return, thought Mary hotly. She wasn't cheap enough to measure cost by cost. But it was so humiliating to send an expensive present like that, and be remembered casually by an engraved Christmas card. Frank would be hurt, though he wouldn't say a thing about it. He'd done a lot this year. He'd saved that baby of the Youngstons, although of course Doctor Allerby got the credit, being head of the pediatric department in the clinic.

"This is Christmas," her holly wreaths, her bedecked tree, her steaming turkey, reminded her, and her mind said wearily and quarrelsomely: "What if it is! It's just another burden. . . ."

"Oh, Betty, you didn't break it! Don't cry so, darling. Oh, what a pity!"

Betty had broken it. The baby doll, which looked so real, and which she had adored when she found it looking over the top of her stocking, had a shattered face.

"Why didn't I get the cheaper one," mourned Mary to herself. "The fifty-cent one would have done just as well. I mustn't scold the poor baby. She feels bad enough. But there's another two dollars practically thrown in the ash can. The doll isn't paid for yet. The bill won't come in before the first of January."

And she took a broom and went in to sweep up the fragments and comfort Betty. She had hoped to steal half an hour to go off by herself and wheedle her nerves into greater placidity, set her mind in order, with the great central thought of the Nativity in the middle, where it belonged.

BUT there was to be no time for that. It was after twelve already—the children had to be dressed for dinner now. There was pleasure in that at least. The soiled stockings were whisked off, the roughened hair brushed, and Betty's irrelevant, not-to-be-relied-on curls stood out bravely all over her head today. She had a new dress, her first silk one, which Mary had made herself, of soft pink crêpe de chine. Betty smoothed its ruffles and forgot the broken doll.

The guests arrived shortly. There were the usual Christmas ones, the very immediate relatives: Frank's mother and father, Mary's aunt, and her widowed sister, Ethel, the one who had married so well and had a touch of social and financial splendor which she had never allowed anyone to forget.

The grandparents came first, very merry indeed, very full of Christmas mischief, with a teasing way about packages, and a desire to slip candy to the children, because, after all, Christmas was Christmas, and children had a right to be sick if they wanted to on that day.

The aunt, Josephine, came up the walk puffing. She nearly slipped on the last step outside, and, being a large woman, the thought of it both unnerved her and furnished her with preliminary conversation as to why they didn't try sand or, at least, ashes on those terrible steps. Ethel came a little later, just after one o'clock, with a faint air of intimating that no holiday could be a holiday for her; but she didn't want to spoil the pleasure of anyone else.

She took off her coat in Mary's room and smiled pathetically at her sister.

"Five years ago today," she remarked reminiscently, "Perry and I were dining at the St. Germains'. I passed their house as I came down. There were automobiles lined up outside for half a block. I suppose they never have less than twenty-four at Christmas dinner. I remember—"

"Don't," said Mary. "Come down and see how pretty the tree looks."

She was sorry for Ethel, but sometimes she was also irritated into wondering whether Ethel grieved more at being widowed of a husband or of a social position.

They sat around the living-room, Mary making frequent little trips to the kitchen to make sure that everything was all right. Jennie, stirring gravy, looked pointedly at the clock.

"It's one now, Mrs. Knight," she said.

"I know it is, Jenny. The doctor ought to be here any minute."

Fifteen minutes, twenty minutes, with

"Last night I came home with great news"

"I'd telephoned Ruth that I had a surprise for her and she could hardly wait for me to get home. You should have seen her face when I told her the Boss had called me in and given me a $25 increase in salary.

" 'It's wonderful,' she said, 'just wonderful. Now we can pay some of those bills that have been worrying us and even put a little in the bank each week.

" 'Remember the night we saw that coupon in a magazine and you decided to take up an I. C. S. course? It made a new man of you, Bob, and I knew it wouldn't be long before the firm would notice the difference in your work.

" 'We certainly owe a lot to the International Correspondence Schools. You would never have received this increase if you hadn't studied at home and prepared yourself for bigger work.' "

How about you? Are you always going to work for a small salary? Are you going to waste your natural ability all your life? Or are you going to get ahead in a big way? It all depends on what you do with your spare time.

Don't let another precious hour pass before you find out what the I. C. S. can do for you. It doesn't cost you a penny or obligate you in any way to ask for full particulars, but that one simple, little act may be the means of changing your entire life. Do it now!

every second adding to the grievance and nervous worry in her mind. Then came the telephone, and Mary went to it, determined to head off any calls for an hour or two.

It was Francis.

"Mary," he said, in that hushed voice which meant that he spoke from someone else's house, "I'm sorry, but I'll be held up for a couple of hours. Don't wait for me."

"But, Frank, dinner's ready. The family's here."

"Just go ahead without me. I'll be home as soon as I can. Sorry. Wish them all a Merry Christmas for me."

He hung up the telephone, and she sat there beside it for a minute, anger and fatigue and disappointment all fighting for possession of her. She knew she might cry. She knew she might say anything. On Christmas! Doctor Allerby would be home. He wouldn't be ruining his wife's Christmas dinner.

Why did Frank let everyone impose on him! If some child was sick, why didn't he tell the mother what to do for it, and come home. He had a family of his own. Why had she planned any dinner, when she might have guessed in advance that something like this was sure to happen?

Almost unconsciously Mary braced herself, and went to her guests.

"Frank's held up, as usual," she said. "We'll have to eat without him."

"Oh, can't we wait?" urged his mother.

"It's no use. He didn't know when he'd be home. Besides, I told Jennie she could go out," answered Mary, with a certain stiffness that brooked no denial. "Will you carve, Father?"

Mr. Knight said he really didn't know whether he could or not. It was a long time since he'd carved a turkey. But he could find a drumstick for everyone, he was sure of that. And merrily, merrily, he led the way to the dining-room and merrily carved the turkey, which seemed to fly in all directions.

HE WAS not an adequate carver, but he was a gay old gentleman who stood up at intervals and reached down the table to put something on Ethel's plate which she didn't want, or did the same by Aunt Josephine, and insisted that it was Christmas, and therefore all right to stuff the children.

Everyone grew hot. A pinkish flush seemed to spread from cheek to cheek. The warm slices of turkey, the vegetables, began to have a dulling, uncomfortable effect on the dinner party, which even Mary's cranberry sherbet, which hadn't quite hardened, or her salad, failed to mitigate.

The children grew greasy, and uncontrollably, almost hysterically, greedy for new and untried parts of the turkey. The baby up-stairs began to cry, and Mary had to leave the table. She knew as she went that she never wanted to come back to it. But of course she did, for there was more food to be served, ice cream in shapes, and nuts and raisins.

Grandfather Knight's ice cream was in the shape of a holly wreath, and, being somewhat over-frozen, it slipped from under his spoon and dropped on the carpet, which gave him an occasion for jocosity, and he went about the dining-room hanging it on various knobs, to the screaming delight of the children, and leaving sticky places everywhere.

Ethel looked tolerant, and Mrs. Knight beamed at her jolly old husband. As for Mary, she didn't know what her face was doing. If it looked like her mind, she knew it was sick with disappointment and a haunting responsibility for the cost of this miserable dinner, which Frank hadn't even been able to come home to enjoy.

It was over at last and she marshaled her guests back to the living-room, still listening for the noise of a car, or that quick, comforting sound of Frank's footsteps. More than anything else, it hurt to think of him, missing his dinner, missing his night's sleep, working, working, working for people who didn't appreciate him.

Half past three, and the children were querulous. They must exchange the presents, or Christmas would be over before they got to them.

"We must begin to take the presents off the tree, I think," she said.

"Oh, can't we wait for poor dear Frank?" cried his mother, as before.

"I think poor Mary," said Aunt Josephine tartly, "might like to get these children put to bed. They're getting wild. No one knows when Frank will get here."

THAT was the spirit in which the gift giving began, and all the jocosity of Mr. Knight could not remove that trace of something that wasn't quite rancor, but more like acute disappointment, which was tearing at them all: At Mrs. Knight, because her poor boy wasn't home; at Aunt Josephine because Mary, whom she secretly adored, looked tired and worn; at Ethel, because she didn't have a home; at the children, because they were exhausted; at Mary, because Christmas Day wasn't perfect, and she had failed to make it so, and been forced to spend it without her husband.

There were many gifts. Dozens of things which represented the work of months and the careful thought of affection. But for Mary, all glamour had gone as she saw them unwrapped. She suspected that Ethel didn't really like the negligee. Mary had made it herself, and thought it rather lovely, in the making. But now—perhaps it was a trifle tawdry, the orchid not quite Ethel's color. And the money she had spent on the old people, the fine knitted scarf for her mother-in-law, the fur cap for the old man—probably a check would have been much more to the point.

The children had lost all sense of discrimination now. They were interested in quantity, in the excitement of unwrapping more tissue-paper. It seemed to their mother that they were acting like savages, grabbing, tossing aside one present after another. They had too much. Mary realized that she could have saved half the money she had spent on them. Three copies of "Johnny Crow's Garden"—each one expensive—for Betty. Enough doll dishes to set up a colony of dolls in housekeeping. A quilted silk bathrobe for the baby from Ethel.

"Oh, Ethel, that's too nice. You shouldn't have bought that."

"I wanted to," said Ethel, half sulkily.

With bath toys, games, electric trains, things being stepped on, things being casually received, boxes from out of town being opened, the old man capering with three new neckties about his neck, the confusion mounted. Through it, trying to remember the proper forms of gratitude and renew her pleasure adequately, Mary untied ribbons and struggled with knots in silver cord.

Her own presents lay in a heap beside her. Gloves, china, a needle-point chair set from her mother-in-law (nice, but where was the chair?), rhinestone buckles from Ethel (she had no slippers fit for them and no money to buy new ones), books, handkerchiefs, useless things. There was just such a pile for Francis, stockings and ties and mufflers, no doubt. The mess of it all—the fatigue of it all. Would it ever get cleaned up, she wondered?

The baby was crying now. She had been brought down to see her presents and had clung to her old arrowroot stick and slapped everything else away. Mary wondered, as she carried the little year-old child up-stairs, if Cathy were going to be sick. Cathy had caught the general excitement by this time and was hard to quiet. Her mother bathed her, and put her down at length in the darkened little room to go to sleep. Then, waiting to see if Cathy would be still, Mary sat down on the cot bed beside her.

Outside, vesper chimes began to play in some church. "Noël, Noël," they called gently, sweetly, remindingly. The tears came to Mary's eyes, as she thought of that first Mother and her Child in whose honor this day had been set aside. How she had fumbled in celebrating it, and now it was gone. . . .

WHEN she woke, she had lost all memory of the day. She knew that someone had made her warm. There was a soft quilt over her. She knew it was Francis's hand on her forehead. Even in the darkness, she always knew that soft, firm, surgeon's, husband's hand.

"Nice sleep, old girl?"

She sat up, horror-struck, remembering.

"What time is it? Have I been asleep?"

"You only took a couple of hours off."

"But supper—"

"It's all ready. That's why I came to call you. Want to get up?"

She was up in an instant, feeling amazingly refreshed. He was home. He hadn't been very late, after all. That was the way she always felt when he came in. They went into their own room, bright with lights; and she saw that he had changed his clothes, shaved again, looked tired but somehow satisfied.

"Too bad I missed dinner," he said. "I was sorry, but I couldn't help it."

"It was all right. Your father carved."

"He's a great carver, isn't he?" chuckled Francis, and quite casually remarked, "We saved the Whittaker baby."

"Did that baby come! But—"

He nodded. "Early. Wanted to spend Christmas with his folks. He had a few bad hours, but he's steaming along all right now. That's why I missed Christmas with you, darling. Had to get the kid breathing right. They've had rather bad luck in that family with babies."

"She's lost two children," said Mary soberly, thinking of the wistful, rather pathetic face of young Mrs. Whittaker, who had fought so hard for the one thing her money couldn't buy or her husband's adoration give her. "Isn't that wonderful? And you did it, Frank! But I thought she was Doctor Allerby's case?"

"He turned it over to me. He was in and out more or less."

IT CAME to Mary's mind that Doctor Allerby would get the credit too. No one would give it to his assistant who had stayed there all day. With a vigorous sweep she brushed the thought away.

"I'm so proud of you, Frank," she said, pulling off the wrinkled dress she'd slept in and slipping into a thin one that Frank loved.

His lips brushed her neck.

"You keep me going, Mary!"

That was all they allowed themselves, coming quickly back to the immediate affairs before them.

"Isn't it terrible to go to sleep with a houseful of guests?"

"They've had a grand time," Frank told her. "They were hushing each other furiously when I came in, an hour ago. Mother got the supper, and Ethel's down there trying to make the dining-room look like the Ritz."

Ethel was. She had laid the table, using all the best lace and silver. The tall violet tapers that someone had given her for Christmas were lit, and between them a vase of roses lifted proud velvety blooms.

"Where did the flowers come from?" asked Mary.

"A man sent them to me," said Ethel, trying to cool her voice to indifference but not quite succeeding. "They delivered them here and I thought we'd use them."

Mrs. Knight bustled in from the kitchen, a great platter of cold turkey in her hands.

"That husband of mine simply hacked this turkey," she said, smiling, "he never did know how to carve! But it's there, all the same. It's a beautiful bird, Mary."

For some reason, it did look better now. Slices of white meat, slices of dark meat, crisp edges of skin, touches of parsley. Mary felt hungry, and picked off a little piece.

"Nice flavor, isn't it?" asked her mother-in-law.

"Nice flavor," agreed Mary. "Where's Aunt Josephine?"

"Up-stairs dressing Betty and Peter. Let her alone. She adores doing it. She read them to sleep and they've had good naps."

"WHAT dears you all are," Mary said happily.

Why had she thought her living-room anything but beautiful? As she entered it now, the big tree, with its electric lights glowing, winked and glittered with a very profligate Christmas spirit. The fire was burning easily and restfully, and all the tissue paper had been picked up and thrown away. Gifts everywhere, on the tables, on the chairs, things she had seen but hardly appreciated before.

Through the doorway in the hall she saw her father-in-law trying on his new fur cap before the mirror, fancying himself unobserved, his old wrinkled face suffused with pleasure. "We couldn't," thought Mary, "have found anything to suit him better."

Frank came in, as if hunting her.

"Did you like your presents?" she asked. "What did you get, anyway?"

"I got a pair of grand driving gloves," he said, "that must have bankrupted you. First fur-lined ones I've had in years."

"Like them?"

"Didn't I? Did the kids have a good time?"

"They were drunk with presents," said Mary.

"Which reminds me that I haven't given you one."

She had been aware of that, not admitting it to herself, wondering if he really couldn't afford anything, or hadn't had time, determined not to care.

"I don't want one, Frank! It's too utterly nice to have you home tonight. That will be my present."

"I was going to give you a check, a little one," he went on, and she fancied he was apologizing for not being able to do it, "for I knew all this to-do must be making you run close to the wind. But then this came along." He pulled an envelope out of his pocket. "I wanted to give it to you last night when you were so worried about the car and so tired. Then I thought you'd prefer it if I held off until today. And I nearly gave it to you this morning, but I was counting on a grand presentation scene this afternoon. Served me right not to get home. And, would you believe it, for the past half-hour I forgot it!"

She had opened the envelope, drawn out its contents, and looked stunned.

"A THOUSAND dollars! But, Frank, what for?"

"It came to me from the clinic. I've endorsed it over to you, and you can do as you please with it. Doctor Allerby gave it to me last night. He said some nice things about this year's work. But that's not the best of it, old girl. He and his wife are going to Austria next year, so he can study, and I'm going to have charge of the department. He was quite pleased about it today. He likes to feel, in a case like that, there's someone he can count on."

They looked at each other for just a minute, sharing it. Then the children came in, refreshed and riotous, with Aunt Josephine excessively proud of her handiwork in dressing them. Old Mr. Knight made a joke. Mrs. Knight insisted imperiously that everyone must come to supper. Ethel was smiling back of her eyes as she looked at her roses. And Mary's heart was singing.

She asked herself if it was just because of the money, the triumphant outcome of a troubled day. No—she had been happy before that, happy when Frank had wakened her with his hand on her forehead. It was because of her children's faces, the sleeping baby up-stairs, the hospitality at her table, the sparkling tree; because Frank was home and these kin of hers were happy.

There was a song in her head, the one the chimes had left there as she fell asleep, a wordless song made up of the memory of the crèche in the church, the little living Whittaker baby, of winter snows and struggle, of peace that comes at last—Noël, the hymn of birth and home.

Out Where the Highways End!

who talked of a New Russia. Many of Dorizas's best friends were of these Young Russians. Already revolution was boiling in the Empire of the Czar; in the East was the first faint red glow.

Vacation time came again.

"I'm going into Russia to see for myself these things of which you speak," said Dorizas to his Russian friends.

"They won't let you by the border," they protested, alarmed for his safety. "And even if you get by, you'll be killed or sent to Siberia. Every village and town in the Caucasus is full of Cossacks and secret police, and word will go ahead that you have been friendly with us."

But Dorizas, at seventeen, alone and afoot, went into Russia.

He made his way up through the Caucasus, following the shores of the Caspian Sea to the mouth of the Volga. Then he turned west and southward through the land, eating in peasant huts and sleeping by the wayside. Chechen and Laze looked in amazement upon this audacious foreigner who bore no arms, took no sides, expressed no opinions, and who almost daily was searched by the police and soldiers.

"At the entrance to every town," said Dorizas, "I was halted by guards, who pointed their rifles and ordered hands up. Then I would have to state the purpose of my visit, and show what was in my knapsack. Officials would question me, for they were suspicious of anyone who came from the outside. But I spoke frankly and always they let me go on. A man on foot, with only a knapsack in which were a hammock and a light sleeping-bag, couldn't be very dangerous. Some days I was stopped four and five times.

"I learned the necessity of the hammock and sleeping bag during my first trip in the Balkans," he explained. "Peasant huts and beds aren't always just as clean as you'd like them to be. Yet one must sleep somewhere.

"The hammock serves me when I sleep indoors; I simply swing it in my room, whether that be in house or stable. And if the house is too dirty and the weather is clear, I pitch my sleeping bag on the ground outdoors. In larger cities, of course, I go to a hotel; but seldom is it a big hotel. I keep as close as I can to the people I'm studying."

AT SEA, he travels in the tourist-cabin class. On trains in Europe, he buys a second-class or a third-class ticket, rarely a first.

"The less money I spend on luxuries," he added, "the farther I can travel, and the oftener I can go. The country is just as interesting and the journey just as quick in the third-class compartment as in the first-class one. And all Europeans, except the rich, travel by second- or third-class coach. In a few countries there is fourth-class. I've tried them all."

"How about when your clothing wears out?" I asked.

"I buy new," he laughed. "The good

They learn to play so easily and quickly

Today your children can have all the advantages of piano playing without the drudgery of old fashioned instruction . . .

MOTHERS everywhere are giving their children the advantages of these new, modern methods that enable beginners to learn to play so quickly.

Music has taken great strides in these recent years. Along with the many developments in other cultural educational work, has come this new, inspiring idea in piano study. It is now possible for every child, regardless of talent, to acquire the great gift of musical expression through the piano.

The drudgery of former years has been eliminated. Today, children are brought into the realm of the piano, at home and in school, through the interesting appeal of rhythm, melody and harmony.

They Can Start At Home!

With up-to-date, modern aids, such as the now famous Look-and-Play Books, you can start the instruction yourself, at home.

Your piano dealer has these books and if you have no piano of your own at present, he will let you use one at his store.

There is also a music teacher near you, who can tell you more about this new and happy means to piano accomplishment. Every progressive music teacher is interested in making the piano more easily available to the children of America.

Free Help for Beginners!

For parents who have no piano but who want to start their children at once on the royal road to music, we will send, on application, free of charge, a Four Octave Keyboard on heavy paper.

Buried Treasure

Lies within your reach

WILL YOU FIND IT?

"The Golden Age of opportunity lies before you, young men of America," says Irving T. Bush, President of the Bush Terminal. Airplanes, radio, television, talking movies, are only an indication—opportunities are everywhere. Treasure is buried under your feet. Do you know how to make it yours?

Don't Miss It

There has just been published a book by a man who found his treasure where others overlooked it—who built a mighty business and a national reputation on a waste sand lot. This man whom Thos. A. Edison has called "an asset to the country" is Irving T. Bush. His book, dedicated to the young men of America, has one purpose: to help you find your opportunity and to make the most of it.

How This Book Can Help YOU

No man worthy of the name can read this book without gaining new ideas and new vigor for his job—but he will gain much more than that. "Working With the World" will set your imagination going; will make you able to see the golden opportunities where others miss them. And it will help you lay the two great foundation stones of success: STRAIGHT THINKING and DECISIVE ACTION.

THIS BOOK IS THE KEY to your opportunity. Can you afford to let it slip? Thousands of ambitious men have found invaluable help in its pages. The book is snappy, concrete, full of incident and illustration, and above all, true.

Once in a lifetime there comes a book like this. Don't think you are too smart to need it. The more brains you have the more you will get out of it. Return this coupon now.

traveler is he who travels light. Clothing can be had anywhere."

"What you wear," he went on, "matters little. It is what you carry in your head that counts, for nobody takes any more out of a country than he takes in. Go into it empty-headed, and you come out empty-headed. My greatest preparation for a journey is the study of the land and people I am going to visit. I never go into a state, a city, or even a village without first learning all I can about it. Knowledge doesn't come unbidden through a car window."

So, for an afternoon in the quiet of his university study, and for an entire evening in a little Greek restaurant where the coffee is as thick and sweet as sirup, I followed this school-teacher around the world. We talked of men and things and adventure. We leaped oceans and continents, all on a school-teacher's salary and in a teacher's spare time, made up of summer vacations and special "leaves."

After Russia, on that first trip, Dorizas had gone into Egypt, the Sahara, Asia Minor, Albania, Syria, and Persia. Swinging northward into Europe, on another journey, he had finally tramped the roads of Sweden and sailed the Atlantic to America, before he was twenty-one! Then, at twenty-three, he had located in Philadelphia, to make that city his base, from which to rove into Mexico and South America, into Canada and Alaska. On one trip of sixteen months he girdled the globe and visited thirty-five countries. He has been in India, Manchuria, and the Gobi Desert. All told, he has visited most of the one hundred and four listed nations of the world!

"TELL me of your first real adventure," I urged.

He got to it finally, and, oddly enough, it had happened within twenty miles of home while he was a teacher at Robert College in Constantinople. Turkey at the time (1908), was over-run by irregular bands of Young Turks, and the guerrilla warfare that went on ceaselessly between this element and the government troops supplied a great opportunity to outlaws and bandits. The latter, masquerading as Young Turks, made life a nightmare in the hills. Homes were pillaged, and people murdered at the first sign of resistance.

Late one afternoon, Dorizas and a young student companion were exploring in the hills. They were on horseback and following a narrow roadway along the edge of a cliff. An armed horseman appeared suddenly in front of them and in menacing voice ordered, "Hands up!"

The man was an Albanian, and alone, but what most attracted Dorizas was his horse. It was a splendid and fiery animal, and one that could have come from only the finest of stables. Furthermore, it wasn't at ease with the rifleman on its back. At once Dorizas concluded that it had been stolen, and that the mounts of himself and companion were the thief's next objective.

"Instead of putting up my hands," Doctor Dorizas related, "I asked the fellow what he wanted. He now saw that we were unarmed, whereupon he ordered us to accompany him, and threatened to shoot us on the spot if we hesitated to comply. For myself, I had no objection to going with him, but I was concerned over my companion. I told the fellow as much.

"'I'll go along with you,' I said, 'provided you'll let this boy turn around and go home.'

"He looked at me for fully a moment, and I looked at him. Apparently, he didn't like my size and my attitude. At any rate, he took aim with his rifle and was about to fire; but just as he loosened his reins to do this, an operation that demanded the use of both of his hands, his horse reared up angrily. He had to grab the reins to control it.

"Again he tried to get his rifle into position, but again the horse diverted him by its plunges. In that narrow road, on a rearing horse, it was impossible for him to fire. Nor could we turn for a run, due to our position. The man had us hemmed in. The duel between thief and horse continued for five minutes or more, while my friend and I sat on our own horses, looking on.

"Then, to our astonishment and relief, the man suddenly wheeled his horse and bolted. Not for some little time did we discover why: A detachment of soldiers rode up. We hadn't seen them, but evidently he had. They told us that the horse had been stolen and that the fellow riding it was one of the country's most notorious bandit leaders. He was captured a week later, after being traced through the horse."

I LOOKED at Dorizas's iron arms, at the curve of muscles under his light coat. In his travels about the world, I wondered, had he ever been required to bring his strength into play? I asked him.

"In Mongolia," he said, and smiled reminiscently.

"I wanted to do some studying in the Gobi Desert," he related, "and to get some first-hand knowledge of the Mongols. They are an ancient people, you know. At one time they ruled the world. They are polyandrists; that is, some of the married women have two or more husbands. The basic reason for this, of course, is the fact that the country has more men than women.

"I hired an American-made automobile with a Chinese driver, and went into the Gobi for seven hundred miles, as far as the capital city of Urga. At every stop I was warned of bandits, who preyed on travelers whenever there was promise of loot. However, I wasn't especially concerned, for I had nothing to loot; and though one lone traveler less in the Gobi would have meant nothing to the bandits, I couldn't see how they would find any profit in shooting a harmless school-teacher.

"It is a rugged, barren, and forbidding part of the world. I carried a rifle, not for defense, but to provide us with food. We slept in the open, for no white man would think of sleeping in a Mongol yurt, or tent, with its native occupants. What money I carried I had hidden between the soles of my shoes. In appearance I was far from a rich prize, but still I kept my eyes open when off the beaten roads, though these latter were barely perceptible trails.

"I hunted with the Mongols, and what astonished me most about them was their uncanny sense of location. One day I shot an antelope. I bled the carcass and swung it over my shoulders to take it with me on my pony. My Mongol companion made signs that I should leave it on the ground, and that we would return for it at sunset.

"I looked about. In every direction swept the desert. There wasn't so much as a bush to mark the spot, not a single locating sign. After we had moved on a short distance I glanced back to where the antelope was lying. I could see nothing. I said to myself, 'Good-by, antelope.'

"And yet, after hunting throughout the day, during which we covered fifteen or twenty miles of desert, the Mongol led me straight back to the dead animal, as unerringly as if we had left it at a designated street address in a city. He didn't approximate the spot but came to it directly, and from a direction opposite to the one we had gone in the morning.

"I took many side excursions, by horse and camel, to villages and Mongol encampments. On these my Chinese chauffeur did not accompany me, and it was on one such excursion that I encountered the bandits. I was on camel-back searching for a Chinese village of peculiar origin, when I noticed a party of four or five horsemen. I concluded it would be best to avoid them, and this I succeeded in doing. But I had no more than done so when I ran into their main body, and was almost immediately surrounded.

"There were about forty of the bandits. Some of them wore remnants of Chinese army uniforms, from which I concluded they were former soldiers; but they were commanded by a Mongol chief. Fortunately, I had succeeded in hiding my rifle before capture and their search of me disclosed nothing of value. At this, a great jabbering set up among them in mixed Mongol and Chinese.

"I hadn't the slightest notion what they were talking about, but guessed there was an argument over what should be done with me. Various members spoke heatedly, others more indifferently, and an expert or two looked over my camel. The chief himself merely listened.

"THEN I had an idea. Primitive peoples and especially the nomadic tribes who live by plundering those weaker, have an almost reverential respect for physical strength. Some years before, in an Arab village, I had almost achieved the rank of a prophet by lifting the chieftain above my head by grasping the lower part of his legs with my hands. This Mongol chief didn't weigh any more than one hundred and seventy-five pounds.

"I spoke in Russian, and the chief understood. I flexed my arm and asked him to test the hardness of the muscles. At once his eyes opened in admiration. The jabbering stopped.

"'Now I'll lift you,' I said. 'Make your body rigid.'

"Whereupon I seized his ankles and hoisted him upright, high above the others, and held him there.

"The bandits were delighted. They laughed and approved like a lot of boys. When I put the chief down he, too, was all smiles, and he made his decision, as did all of the band, by using the ancient Roman gesture of 'thumbs up.' And so I got my freedom."

With an American friend, in 1912, Doctor Dorizas had started a trip around the world. Reaching Russia, they followed the Volga River to the Caspian Sea, went on to Baku, and then crossed into Persia. There Dorizas's companion was taken

It isn't the years that make a skin grow old

. . . . it's weathering

SOME young faces look old—because the skin is weatherbeaten. Some older faces look young—because the skin is delightfully fresh. For the years have little to do with the freshness of the skin. It's weathering that makes the difference.

See for yourself

Take a mirror to a bright window. Look carefully at your face. Now look at the skin on your shoulders. Younger, isn't it? Yet in point of years your face and your shoulders are the same age. But your face has been exposed. Your shoulders have not. Protect the face and it stays young, too.

You can—easily—with Hinds Honey & Almond Cream. It protects the skin from weathering.

At this season of the year, with its drear rains and whistling sleet, the skin chaps—a violent form of weathering.

When that happens, pat on Hinds Cream. It works magic with chapped skins. Heals the rawness. Gently smooths. Coaxes back the freshness.

But even better than that—use Hinds Cream to prevent chapping. Simply pat it on as a powder base before going outdoors.

Pat it on your face at night, too—and in the morning. Rub it vigorously all over you after your bath (takes out the tiredness). It'll keep your skin blessedly white—silky—young.

You'll find Hinds Cream in its blossom pink bottle on every toilet goods counter. Start using it today. Or if you like, we'll gladly send you a generous sample bottle in return for the coupon below. Just fill it in and mail. © L. & F., Inc., 1928 seriously ill with typhoid fever and had to be brought back to Baku, where Dorizas tried to nurse him through the crisis of the disease.

It was summer, and the Caspian summers are hot. Evenings, after he had spent the day at his friend's bedside, Dorizas formed a habit of going down to the water front to enjoy the breeze from over the sea. Standing on a dock one evening, he was attracted by the actions of three seamen from an oil tanker drawn up near by. The seamen, all big rough fellows, had accosted two Jewish girls after thrusting aside the girls' escort. The men had been drinking and the girls were in need of help.

Dorizas admonished the men. Hot words followed, and a blow. The three leaped onto the "foreign meddler" to make short work of him:

"What happened then?" I asked.

The big, good-natured doctor twisted and grew red in embarrassment. "I knocked one fellow out and tossed the other two into the sea," he confessed.

"And then what?"

"The whole ship's crew came at me," he admitted, "seven of them. I tossed a couple more into the sea. I hit two or three more, and they went down and stayed down. One had a crowbar. I took it away from him as he approached, and threw it into the sea. He might have killed somebody with that crowbar."

At the first blow, the girls' escort had run for the police, leaving Dorizas to face the seamen alone. The crew of the oil tanker was rapidly strengthened by sailors from other boats, until more than a dozen men were in the battle. When the police finally arrived, our school-teacher was down on his back unconscious, but he wasn't down alone. A half-dozen seamen were sprawled about the dock, and at least four others were engaged in dragging themselves out of the sea.

Once the story was out, Doctor Dorizas laughed, shrugged his huge shoulders, and ventured that he had been lucky.

"Lucky?" I repeated.

"Sure," he nodded. "It was lucky that it happened in Russia. The Russian fights with his fists. He doesn't resort to a knife. In many ports of the world—swish! And that would have been the end of me. I was lucky!"

I WAS looking at some photographs in Doctor Dorizas's room. One had been riddled with bullets.

"Oh, that," Dorizas laughed, "is a souvenir of South America. I happened to get caught in a revolution down there, and that picture was hanging on the wall of my hotel room at the time.

"It was in 1922," he related, "in the early part of the same trip that later took me into Mongolia. I was having a most interesting time. I had come down through Mexico and Central America, poking about into odd places in search of remnants of the ancient Indian civilization. My curiosity led me naturally to Cuzco, the ancient Inca capital, in Peru, which, archæologically, is the most interesting town in South America.

"I considered myself fortunate in getting a room in the hotel directly across the street from the governor's palace, and on the hotel's top floor. There were whispers of trouble brewing, but one isn't inclined to take such matters seriously in South America. In fact, nothing would have pleased me better than to be a spectator in a revolution, but at the moment I didn't know that I was literally sleeping under one.

"I awoke one morning to the zip of bullets through my windows and the rattle of machine-guns below and above my head. It seemed to be raining bullets into my room. You can guess that I lost no time in getting to a safer place.

"Investigating, I found this to be the situation: A detachment of the revolutionists had stationed themselves on the roof of my hotel directly over my room, and from that point had opened fire on the governor's house. The governor's soldiers had immediately replied by training their machine-guns on the roof, but their aim had been a trifle low for a time. I counted more than fifty bullets lodged in the walls of my room, and the windows were riddled.

"The damages that morning were sixty men killed and sixty-odd wounded. But the revolution failed, Cuzco became its old peaceful self again, and the hotel keeper was profuse in his apologies for the 'temporary inconvenience.'"

ON ONE other occasion Dorizas's life was endangered. This was in Syria during his mission there with the International Commission, immediately after the war. He was taking across country an automobile truck loaded with valuable records of the commission, and also with six or seven large cans of gasolene. One of the gasolene cans leaked and Dorizas issued strict orders against smoking on the truck.

A Syrian, riding in the rear of the truck, nodded solemnly at the no-smoking order, and as soon as Dorizas took his seat in front with the driver proceeded to light a cigarette. Nothing happened, so the Syrian passenger lighted up again, this time just as the truck was zooming along at forty miles an hour on a long hill. Above the roar, Dorizas heard a shriek. He turned to see the Syrian sprawling in the road and flames bursting from the truck's rear!

The doctor finished the account thus:

"We got the truck stopped. I jumped into the rear and threw out the gasolene cans, and managed to get the fire out before it had damaged the papers. Then I loaded the gasolene back, and we went on."

"Weren't you pretty badly scared, with fire lapping around that leaky can?" I inquired.

"Oh, yes," he assured me. "You see, the records of all of our work were in danger. It would have been very bad had we lost them."

I asked him a series of questions, then, that I felt were of general interest.

"Who are the most hospitable people in the world?"

"Mountaineers, anywhere," he answered, "and especially those of the Balkans and Greece. They are offended if you offer them money for entertainment."

"The politest people?"

"The French, but they don't always mean it. The French are also the most contented, which is why they don't leave home. And they are the best cooks, which is why they are so contented.

"The Mohammedan peoples, too, are contented, but in an entirely different way. An instance or two will tell you what I mean by this. I asked an Arab how old he was. 'Seventy,' he replied. I protested. 'Well, sixty then,' he said. 'But you are not even sixty,' I insisted. 'What difference does it make whether I am fifty, sixty, or seventy?' he demanded. 'I have lived so many years, and I will live so many more. How old I am is of no importance.'

"Even death doesn't move the Mohammedan. I was in northern Persia during a smallpox epidemic. The whites were doing everything to check it and save life, but the natives remained utterly indifferent, though dying in droves.

"'You Christians are fools,' the old gatekeeper at Teheran told me. 'A tree has both sound and weak apples. A storm comes, and it shakes the weaker apples from the tree. Man cannot stop the storm, nor can he save the apples to the tree. This, too, my friend, is a storm, and the apples are men. The weak will drop from the tree of life, the strong remain. Only the fool defies the storm of Allah.'

"I am often asked who are the most beautiful women. Perhaps I take my life in my hands when I say that I have seen more beautiful women in the little South American country of Uruguay than in any other part of the world. The women of the United States and England enjoy the most freedom and independence, consequently these countries also have the most old maids.

"The Japanese are one of the most cleanly peoples, and the Mongols, beyond a doubt, are the dirtiest. The Mongol wears a long tunic, and he wears it, without benefit of bathtub or laundry, until it wears out, which usually is for a period of ten or twelve years. His chief food is boiled mutton fat, which speaks for itself.

"The most melancholy and those who feel most deeply are the Russians. Read their literature, listen to their music, and think of their long winters. The Albanians are the most diffident, and the Greeks are the most democratic. Every Greek deems himself as good as every other Greek. Your mule-driver will sit down to eat with you as his right, and the bootblack is as good as the prime minister. This extreme of democracy has been one of the nation's greatest drawbacks, for the real Greek resents it if another rises above him.

"THE most fearless men, as a class, that I have seen anywhere in the world are English officers. Courage is bred into them from the cradle until it is second nature. Fighting with them is a business, and danger is a sport. It 'just isn't cricket' for the English officer to be afraid, or to show that he is afraid, if he is."

"And where do we Americans come in?" I inquired.

"The Americans are the most generous, the most prosperous, and the most progressive," was Doctor Dorizas's reply. "I believe that my estimation of the American is best expressed by the fact that I, a Greek born in Turkey and fairly familiar with the world, am an American by choice and adoption."

The Man Who Lived in Eternity Now!

But she understood thereafter why this man never gave way to his grief, except in the privacy of night. When Jim Pumpton, up the road, lost his wife, and Jake Hadley went up to spend a night with him, she understood Pumpton's tribute to Hadley at the Whipple Hollow store next day. . . .

He could smile and tell jokes with his associates, however. He led no morbid, hermit's existence. Only a steady serenity permeated his mind and heart and face.

The years 1915, 1916, and finally 1917, made consciousness of the war almost a human habit, an accepted item in the world's daily life. Then America got into the blood glut, and Jacob Hadley's serenity was best demonstrated the evening of the day when Seba Hadley left for Camp Devens.

Amy had not gone to the station to see Seba off. Somehow, she couldn't. Besides, there was Nellie, who must be stayed with. It was late in the evening when Hadley returned.

"Well," he said simply, hooking his hat very deliberately on its nail behind the range, "he's gone, Amy. And may God and his mother watch over him."

Amy was leaning back against the sink. When Jacob turned around, she had her hand at her throat.

"Suppose," she choked, "suppose he . . . he never comes back?"

"Well," returned Jake, in his calm voice, "then he'll only just be away a few years on a visit, that's all. A visit . . . to his ma. What if he should happen to go see his ma a spell, from the war? 'Twouldn't be any different than as if she lived in some foreign country, would it? He'd still be in existence somewhere, wouldn't he? That's the way we must look at it."

"I wish, oh, how I wish! . . . he might have been my boy . . . off at the war!" She could not see him for her tears.

"Do you, Amy? Well, if it's any comfort to you, the last two or three years I've sort o' carried the idea around that he is your boy. You've certainly done enough for him to have more'n a housekeeper's interest in him."

HE MOVED into the sitting-room. It was a long time before she dared trust herself in there with him. She saw him through the open door, seated in his evening rocker by the table, his head in his hands. She saw him reach into his hip pocket after a time, and draw forth the tiny pair of battered covers. He opened them, and looked long and earnestly inside.

The light of the lamp shone sideways on his face. And as Mrs. Pressey watched, she suddenly saw his eyes clear, his mouth grow so firm it was beautiful. A strange effulgence seemed to come from his countenance as he drew a deep breath and sank back in his chair. . . .

To get to her room she had to pass him, where he sat with his chin thrust deep in

I Will Train You at Home to Fill a Big-Pay Radio Job

If you are earning a penny less than $50 a week, send for my book of information on the opportunities in Radio. It's FREE. Clip the coupon NOW. A flood of gold is pouring into Radio, creating hundreds of big pay jobs. Why go along at $25, $30 or $45 a week when the good jobs in Radio pay $50, $75 and up to $250 a week? "Rich Rewards in Radio" gives full information on these big jobs and explains how you can quickly learn Radio through my easy, practical home-study training.

Salaries of $50 to $250 a Week Not Unusual

The amazing growth of Radio has astounded the world. In a few short years three hundred thousand jobs have been created. And the biggest growth is still to come. That's why salaries of $50 to $250 a week are not unusual. Radio simply hasn't got nearly the number of thoroughly trained men it needs.

You Can Learn Quickly and Easily In Spare Time

Hundreds of N. R. I. trained men are today making big money—holding down big jobs—in the Radio field. You, too, should get into Radio. Stay home, hold your job, learn in your spare time. Lack of high school education or Radio experience are no drawbacks.

Many Earn $15, $20, $30 Weekly On the Side While Learning

I teach you to begin making money shortly after you enroll. My new practical method makes this possible. I give you SIX BIG OUTFITS of Radio parts and teach you to build practically every type of receiving set known. M. E. Sullivan, 412 73rd St., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes, "I made $720 while studying." G. W. Page, 1807 21st Ave., S., Nashville, Tenn. "I picked up $935 in my spare time."

Your Money Back If Not Satisfied

his chest. He lifted his hand, and its touch on her arm arrested her.

"Amy," said he, "I don't know how I can ever repay you for the interest you've taken in me and my children." His eyes remained set straight ahead, however. Their glances did not meet.

"You don't have to think of that, Jacob. You've already repaid me . . . more'n you'll ever know."

"I've tried to give you all I could, Amy. Things haven't gone easy, with the children to raise. Are you really satisfied?"

Was she? Again the brief, sharp struggle. "If I hadn't been, Jacob, I never could have stayed."

"I know a lot of folks hereabouts wonder why I've never asked you to . . . to . . . really be mother . . . to Seba and the rest. . . . I mean, legally."

"Well?" she managed. She felt herself beautifully resigned to whatever might come.

"I think I ought to tell you, Amy. . . . I owe it to you. . . . I never felt I had the right to do that. Because . . . it would look as though I'd be imposin' on your kindness, sort of. I'd be askin' you to tackle this job permanently, with no chance of ever pullin' out if you got dissatisfied. If 'twas only myself, 'twould been different. We might . . . we might o' had children of our own. But putting four or five children belongin' to another woman on you— 'Twouldn't be square, and I just couldn't do it. I wanted you should know."

She might have answered then, "Not if I cheerfully wanted to shoulder that load, Jacob, because it's yours?" But she didn't. She couldn't. Not that night. Somehow, she sensed it would savor of taking advantage of his distress over the day's parting with his boy. So she waited.

"Amy!"

"Yes, Jacob."

"You've made me think the same way toward you, all the same. I wanted you should know that, too." He swallowed with difficulty but resumed, "If you want to stay, Amy, till . . . till there aren't any more youngsters 'round here needin' a housekeeper . . . so I won't feel the way I do in respects to them . . . maybe when they're gone, Amy, and there's only you and me—"

"I understand, Jacob."

"Amy . . . will you . . . stay?"

"So long as you're alive and need me, Jacob. After what we've been through together the past two or three years, I'd rather . . . I'd rather die than leave. I hope . . . I hope I do die to leave!"

"Then it's . . . it's understood between us?"

"Understood things, Jacob, don't have to be talked about."

"Thank you, Amy."

She got to her room. Thus began their "engagement."

IN 1918, Dot Hadley was eighteen years old, graduated from high school and assistant office girl in the "Telegraph" plant. They had taken her father from in front of a knitting machine to help erect some new buildings for the mill, down along the river. Which explains how it came about that Sam Hod had to be the one to break the news to Jacob that thenceforth America would ever be his debtor.

The Western Union boy brought the Government's telegram to the office to give it to Dot. But Seba's sister was absent, collecting some bills. Sam gripped his courage and tore open the fateful envelope.

"I'm going down to the new buildings to see Jacob," said he. "Tell Dot, when she returns, she can have the week off."

Sam found the carpenter off in a corner where the beams of a new warehouse were yellow pine against cerulean cobalt. Bent over a "horse," he was sawing a board. He laid his big steel square on the board, drew a heavy black line with the stub of a pencil, then thrust the stub under his cap.

"Howdy, Samuel," he called in greeting. Then he must have read something in the editor's eyes. His glance dropped to the sinister yellow paper. He picked up his saw and sighted along its teeth. "Have you . . . have you come over, Samuel, . . . to tell me that . . . that Seba's with his mother?"

"Yes, old friend. The boy is with his mother."

JACOB started the saw on the edge of the board. He sawed slowly, steadily, with clean, even strokes. The sawed piece fell down in the gravel. The carpenter brushed his horny palm along the under edge of the cut to take off the fuzz. Then he laid aside the saw, picked up the board, carried it across to the growing wall, and started driving nails.

"Jacob!" whispered the editor, when he returned. "What can I say?"

Jake's eyes smiled gently. "Say? Why, there's nothing to be said. He's been Eva's as much as mine, hasn't he? Why should I be selfish and want him all his life?"

At once the blind daughter began having obsessions.

Very soon after the news of Seba's death the Armistice came. The boys returned home. The Hadley household out on the back road became resigned to the realization that Seba would always "be away" . . . if it had ever been otherwise. But the eldest girl frightened Amy Pressey and the neighbors half out of their senses with her sudden insistences that Seba was often right there in the house.

"He comes to me in the night," the blind girl confided to Mrs. Hod. "He says, 'Nellie, Mother's waiting, waiting for you . . . till she can have you and Father and Tommy and Myra and Jeanie and Dot all with her, along with Bobby and me.'" Bobby had been the name of the infant drowned with Jacob's wife.

"But it would be wicked to do anything to yourself that took you away from your father," Mrs. Hod protested.

"Wicked to go to Mother and Seba and little Bobby? Aren't we all going, sooner or later? Besides, I'm so useless to everyone, and somehow . . . somehow I feel that when I go to where Mother is, I'll be given back my eyes!"

It was on a February night about half-past ten, and freezing cold, that Amy Pressey missed Nellie from beside her in the bed. The father had driven Tommy and the other girls into town for a picture show. Mrs. Pressey, wearied with the day's labors, yet finding a blessed satisfaction in them, had gone to bed shortly after the Hadley pung-sleigh had driven from the yard. Nellie had gone to bed an hour before, and was apparently asleep.

A draft of icy air blowing through the house had finally awakened Amy. Outside, in the shed, Tommy's Airedale dog was barking savagely. The housekeeper leaped out, thrust her feet into slippers and caught up a wrap.

The night wind from the opened porch door had extinguished the lamp she had left burning against the family's return. But a vast, white, lunar plate hung high above the mountains. With eerie clearness it showed yard, buildings, and surrounding country. Forgetting her own exposure, Amy Pressey ran out toward the barns.

She knew that if Nellie were river-bent, the girl would get her bearings by starting at a point between the wagon shed and corn crib. She had done it before. And so bright was the moonlight, that on arriving there the frantic woman discerned telltale footholes freshly broken in the snow crust down across the river pasture.

That crust cut her naked ankles like glass, as she fled on numb feet to overtake the fugitive. A great rent was opened in her nightdress when she finally climbed the low wall of boulders. Great black splotches against white ice disclosed treacherous air holes, where the current was swift. Amy half ran, half slid, down the slight incline to where something alive was moving near the edge.

"Nellie! For God's sake, Nellie! Come back!"

But instead of halting the half-crazed girl that warning only galvanized her. She trod out unsteadily toward a vast, tragic, black place.

A pile of old timbers lay along the embankment. Amy Pressey got one loose by superhuman strength. If the ice gave way, the heavy board might float—or give her something as "purchase" by which rescue might be effected. She got out on the ice.

A queer, hollow, crackling noise began to snap all around her. Water she scarcely felt was swirling around her ankles. It grew deeper—up to her knees. The edges of the nightgown floated on it. Then she lost hold of the board!

A triangular piece of ice somersaulted under her—with Nellie also wading in knee-deep water not twelve feet ahead of her. Amy's shrieks were heard by the Pumptons, living on the hill top. . . .

Jim Pumpton and his two eldest boys came down with lanterns a few minutes later. They recognized the meaning of the twin footholes in the snow crust leading to the river's edge, of the mute board out on the ice, bobbing in the broken place.

THE Pumptons were waiting for Jacob and the girls when they drove into the yard around midnight.

"Brother Hadley," Jim said huskily, "I'm 'fraid there's been an accident."

The children sat horrorstruck. The father looped his reins about the dashboard.

"Is it the house or the river, neighbor?" the carpenter asked steadily.

"The river, Mr. Hadley."

"Where's Mrs. Pressey?"

"We got her body out of the second water hole. But I guess the blind girl's gone down to the dam."

"What do you mean, second water hole?"

A Christmas Gift . . . that comes twelve times a year

What gift could you offer your friends this Christmas, more welcome or expressive of your heart's good wishes than a year's subscription to The American Magazine?

Make Christmas mean more than a day

Some friends of yours have just married. They are planning ahead. All along their way your gift of The American Magazine will help, advise and bring them happiness . . .

Some friends of yours, parents of growing children, will thank you for the wholesome influence, the fun, the rare good spirit of this gift . . .

Some friend of yours, in business, will welcome the wise counsel which your gift brings from leaders in American life . . .

There is a lover of nature to whom your gift will come as an ever-welcome, genuine treat . . .

There is one, perhaps tied down by work or home affairs, who dreams of travel. Let him journey with this gift of yours . . .

And others who enjoy the thrill of fascinating stories, who like to follow the new novels, who read for the sheer joy of reading. Your gift will make their year a happy one.

The American Magazine, sent as your gift to any one or more of these friends, will be a message of good will straight from your heart—a gift that speaks directly to their interest, their welfare, their happiness.

It conveys your Christmas message of good will and happiness not once only but twelve times, from this Christmas until next. Those friends you send it to, will know that your gift has come from the heart.

As they enjoy The American Magazine all through 1929—absorb its wise counsel, delight in its rollicking yarns and fascinating novels, its nature and health articles, its popular science and human interest stories—they will know that your greetings are not confined to Christmas day but reach out and touch with happiness all the other days of the year.

Give your friends this wise gift, this lovely, thoughtful, happy, year-long gift.

A beautiful Christmas Card announces your gifts

Every friend to whom you send The American Magazine this Christmas will receive, in your name, a lovely Christmas card specially painted by Herman Pfeifer.

It depicts "Christmas at Mount Vernon" and shows George and Martha Washington standing in the historic doorway to welcome their guests. The dignity of the characters, the beauty of the Colonial costumes, the blue-white colonnades, the snowy roof rising against the evening sky, make a rich and colorful picture finely adapted for framing.

This beautiful card will arrive in your friends' Christmas mail, announcing that you have instructed us to send, as your Christmas gift, a year's subscription to The American Magazine.

Our Special Christmas Offer

The regular price of The American Magazine is $2.50 a year. But during the present Christmas season we are making you this special offer: your own subscription and one for a friend as a Christmas gift, both for only $4.00. And you may add as many more Christmas gift subscriptions as you wish, at $2.00 each. (Your own subscription or one gift subscription is $2.50.) Send in your orders now.

"Current carried her under the ice. We found her a quarter-mile below . . . by the Foxboro ice houses. We went down there lookin', when we see the footprints in the snow crust with blood on the edges of some."

Jake alighted from the pung, walked across, and sat down on the edge of the porch. He pulled off his cap and wiped his forehead with the back of his hand. Jim Pumpton joined him.

"Try and keep your grit, Hadley," Jim consoled. "It's a horrible wallop, I know. And seems to me you've had about all the hard luck you deserve in this life. 'Bout time things broke. If they's ennything the boys and I can do—"

"I'll be all right in a minute." He laid a hand on Jim's friendly knee. "These things happen, neighbor. We've got to be prepared for 'em. The Almighty always makes His readjustments suddenly. Because that's all they are . . . just readjustments."

"Good heavens, Hadley! How can you always take things so peaceful-like?"

"Neighbor, when you once get the idea thoroughly into your head that all of us are livin' in eternity now, these things that people call tragedies won't seem half so terrible as they might. Readjustments, that's what they are. Just readjustments."

JACOB came into the "Daily Telegraph" office next day to smoke a pipe with Sam Hod, after making arrangements for the double funeral. They sat in the inner room, where no one came, and talked as men will talk.

"Samuel," said he as they came to break up, "I've been privileged to know two of the finest women who ever walked this footstool. They're together now, and somethin' tells me they've got acquainted and like each other. How could they help it?"

"What are you going to do now, Jacob?"

"Well, our family's a bit divided: Eva havin' three of the children with her and the other four bein' here with me. But then, it's not goin' to be forever. Real reunion we're going to have somewhere, one o' these days. I've got to take as good care of Tom and Myra and Jeanie and Dot as I know Eva's takin' of Seba and Nellie and little Robert. And it sort of helps a lot to recall that when I've sawed enough boards and drove enough nails, we're all goin' to gather together again in the Evenin', without any breaks in the circle, and look back on the Day and its Work, and see that God's plans for human folks aren't so haphazard as lots of people imagine."

"It does seem sort of unfair, though, for some folks' lives to run to trouble continually, while a lot of others seem to have it so easy . . . people that never do a thing to deserve it. Take you, for instance—"

"Me? I haven't had trouble. Why take me?"

"But first you lost your wife and baby, then the boy in the war, then Nellie and—

"Death isn't trouble, Samuel!" And the carpenter's face held a look of surprise. "I've had lots of good luck. I've had children; I've prospered in my trade; I've had my home. All that's happened to me is havin' my family divided, sort of, right here in middle life. You don't consider it trouble, do you, when your wife goes out to St. Louis and visits her sister all winter, like you was speakin' about? It's trouble for you perhaps, in the inconvenience of her not bein' 'round when you need her to home. But you don't begrudge her the going. It's the same with my Eva, and then again, Amy. 'Tisn't as if I wasn't ever goin' to see 'em again. Seems to me that folks who weep and wail around about death are awful selfish at times. Because they can't have their dear ones right with 'em every minute, they've got to make everybody miserable, and act as though 'twas the end of the world!"

"It is—for some people," said Sam Hod solemnly. "Anyhow, Amy Pressey did a noble thing in trying to keep Nellie with you. All over town today folks are talking about it. Doc Pressey hit Joe Summers an awful wallop in Edwards's cigar store around one o'clock when Joe made some remark about Amy's early escapades."

"Samuel, I've been privileged to know two of the finest women that ever lived on this earth—like I said before. Amy Pressey was the second. She was a loyal, earnest, hard-workin' woman who deserved more and better than I was able to provide. Wherever she and Eva are, they're talkin' things over. And I'll be glad to see both of 'em again, and tell 'em—unashamed—that I loved the two of 'em. Somehow I reckon Eva'll understand!"

He went out of the office finally. When the door had closed on him, Sam said ruefully, "I'll bet when he first met his wife she wasn't one whit better woman than Amy Pressey.

"But a woman couldn't live long around that sort of man without showing herself a thoroughbred. He's such a thoroughbred himself!"

"Kind o' fantastic ideas he's got about death, though," declared George Kenyon, the paper's make-up man, who had entered, to hear the last of Jacob's philosophy.

Sam Hod arose, stood by the window. "George," said he, "do you call yourself a Christian?"

"I try to be," the foreman answered. "I go to church—"

"Yes; you're tenor in the Methodist choir and superintendent of the Sunday-school." (Sam watched Jacob Hadley going up the opposite side of Main Street.) "But, George Kenyon, there goes a man who believes in immortality. The trouble with the rest of us Christians is, we don't!"

IN 1921 Dorothy Hadley left her newspaper job to marry Frank Stevens, eldest son of John Stevens, owner of the local Process Works. Two years later Myra and Jeanie married the Ryker boys—brothers—in a beautiful double wedding that was the talk of the town for a year and a day. Ethan Ryker is now superintendent of the Thorne Knitting Mills, while Malcolm is a chemist in a college in Ohio. All three of Jacob's girls did well in the matter of husbands and, so far as is known, are reasonably happy. Tommy Hadley has lately been living in Boston, where he's training himself to be a commercial artist.

About half past four of an afternoon in the past September, a wild-eyed boy fell into the "Telegraph" office and exclaimed:

"Hey! . . . Jake Hadley—the carpenter's—been knocked for a goal. That stagin' they had up in front o' Blake Whipple's store has all tumbled down, and Hadley's had his back broke!"

Sam Hod ran up Main Street without his hat. They had carried the carpenter as tenderly as possible up into Doctor Johnson's office in the Hawks Block. But as his poor broken body was being borne up the stairs, the soul of the man had slipped away into the eternity he believed in so serenely.

THE editor came back to his office. Jacob Hadley had lived fifty-seven years in this world. He had loved greatly. He had suffered much. Now he knew the secret of life and its essence. Thenceforth, his grizzled editor friend was to think of him as standing by a Gate, looking off down across Fields Beautiful, waiting for children who were late in coming, yet approaching in some fine sunset up across those Fields where the harvests had been garnered and life's sheaves stood in shocks.

Along toward six o'clock, Blake Whipple, the undertaker, came in the office.

"Isn't it funny, Sam," said he, "what little, little things keep some of us mortals going, when the path of life seems dark and all sorts of troubles rag us?"

"Just what do you mean, Blake?"

"I guess most of the town thought that Jake Hadley was lugging around his wife's picture in that extra wallet of his that he glanced at now and then. But it wasn't a picture. I happened to look at it when I removed the contents of his pockets. Maybe I'm an undertaker, Sam. But burying Jake Hadley is the hardest thing I've ever had to do. Look!"

Blake laid the open leather fold before the editor. A sear, faded, dog-eared little motto card was disclosed.

"Think of it, Sam. He carried it because it was the last word he ever got from his wife. That's why it meant so much."

Sam pulled the frail post card from its cover. On the front side, on the left of the line separating the correspondence space from the address, was written in a woman's hand:

DEAREST:
Starting Home tomorrow with Bobby.
Best love, EVA.

"And she did start home, didn't she!" Sam said huskily. "He must have carried it for its double meaning."

"Look on the other side."

Sam turned the card over. In a fancy border he read a motto—the motto the wife had chosen to send—her last earthly word and message to her husband:

God won't look you over for medals, degrees, or diplomas—but for SCARS!

The undertaker left. Sam bowed his head on his hands. It grew dark in the office. And Paul Lyman found him there, at his desk, when he came back after supper to write some items.

He Chose the Way to Larger Success

In Peoria there lives a man named Paul F. Bourscheidt, who a number of years ago began to set his plans for bigger earning power—larger success.

At that time Mr. Bourscheidt was Assistant Actuary of the Peoria Life Insurance Company, one of the outstanding insurance companies of the Middle West. He wanted to broaden his knowledge of business, so as to fit himself for larger responsibilities. So he enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training in Business Management.

"As a result of my training," wrote Mr. Bourscheidt, eleven months later, "I notice a big improvement in my work and my ability to cope with difficult situations. Already I can report a promotion and an increase of 30 per cent, which in these days is no small item."

A year or so later, realizing the importance of legal knowledge in business, he enrolled again with LaSalle—this time for home-study training in Law. He set as his goal the Illinois Bar examinations, which he passed successfully in the fall of 1924.

Was it merely by chance, do you think, that in October of that year Mr. Bourscheidt was made Assistant Secretary and Office Manager of this great company, or that today he is being entrusted with greater and greater responsibilities?

Significant of the worth of his plan—in the eyes of Mr. Bourscheidt's associates—is the fact that 23 other people in the Peoria Life Insurance Company have enrolled with LaSalle for home-study business training. These other executives—both men and women—are out to compel larger success through the speeding up of practical experience.

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

Here's a Plan That Makes Christmas Shopping A Lasting Pleasure

MY WIFE has more relatives than anyone else in the world, with the possible exception of her husband. I have never made a calculation showing how far the sum total of our relatives would reach if they were laid out, end to end; but I have sometimes wished that I might lay out some of them in exactly that way. However, I do not intend to write about our kinsfolks—it is our solution for one of the great Christmas problems superinduced by kinsfolks that I am eager to pass on.

After years of frantic shopping, we hit upon a scheme that saves time and temper. Better still, this scheme of ours is actually educative for us We now delight in doing our Christmas shopping, no matter whether we do it early or late. The multiplicity of our relatives and friends forced us to be intelligent about shopping.

Our Christmas-present list contains more than forty names. If you set out to buy forty presents, with no plan of procedure, you soon run into trouble. You waste time, you get desperate, you postpone the buying until the last few frantic days, and then you buy articles that cost more than you had planned to pay for them, and without much regard to their appropriateness.

I know, for haven't I come to within ten days of Christmas, and still had thirty-seven presents to select? Five years ago that was exactly the situation I was in, for my wife was ill that winter, and the whole load of shopping fell on me. It was after that experience that I set about to solve the problem of "What'll we give 'em this year?" And here's the solution:

SEVERAL weeks before Christmas, or even several months, we decide what type of present we shall give that year, and all of the presents we buy come within whatever classification we decide upon. For instance, this year we are giving pictures. Last year we gave articles made of leather, the year before that, miniature reproductions of famous pieces of sculpture, and three years ago we gave linen. Next year we shall give books. (In making a present to a small child, we sometimes depart from our rule, but not often.)

This plan of ours has many things to recommend it, in addition to its virtues as a saver of time and temper. We can now put some of our own personality into our gifts, which is not possible when haphazard shopping is resorted to. But the thing that delights us most of all is the cultural effect this scheme has had upon us. I knew nothing of linen when we set out to buy forty-six linen presents; but I knew a whole lot about linen before we got through! I had learned where and how it is made, and had come to appreciate the art in designs worked out in linen.

Similarly, I knew very little about plaster casts and other reproductions of famous sculpture before we bought about forty of them. In fact, I was none too well informed about sculpture, and could not even identify many of the most famous pieces. But now I know quite a bit about the world's masterpieces in marble and bronze and stone, and I know which firms make the best reproductions.

AT PRESENT, we are engaged in the selection of fifty pictures. (Our list is larger than usual this year, because we have made some new friends since our circle of interests was enlarged.) I was amazed at the rapidity with which a man's taste in pictures changes. When we started out two months ago to buy all the pictures we would need, I had fairly good taste, I thought. But some of the pictures I then liked I do not care for now. They were fine for a time, but lacked the staying qualities of the Old Masters.

Perhaps I should add that we are not rich, and that we do not give any present that costs more than five to ten dollars. You can get excellent pictures for that, though they may be small reproductions. Seeman prints of all the famous pictures may be had for less than a dollar each, but the frames cost a lot, which always hurts my feelings; it doesn't seem right for the frame to cost more than the picture. Plaster and other reproductions of classic pieces of sculpture cost from three or four dollars, up to as high as you care to go.

But the point is that good things, real art, may be had for the price of silly novelties. We select these gifts, of course, with reference to the tastes and desires of the persons receiving them, and it has been our experience that their very novelty goes far toward ensuring them a cordial welcome in the homes and hearts of those to whom they are addressed.

I do not know what your problem is, but I do think very strongly that, whether you are rich or poor, and whether you give many presents or few, you can profit in time saved, in education gained, and in pleasant shopping adventures if you adopt some such plan as the one my wife and I are so crazy about. And the Christmas presents you give will not cost any more under this plan than they would under the "grab-as-grab-can" method.

Base of Onyx with Lady Size Duofold Pen, a very special value at $8.75. Color of Duofold Pen optional. Same base with any $2.75 Parker Pen priced in combination at $7.50

Now busy men and women own two Duofolds—one to carry with them—one for office or home desk.

And until you've used the Desk Pen made by Parker (held in its handy base—always ready to your hand) you don't know what it saves in time and effort.

You see these Parker Duofold Desk Sets—marks of progress—everywhere today because they are efficient.

Much of that efficiency is due to the pens themselves, so choose your set accordingly.

Pressureless Touch, Geo. S. Parker's 47th Improvement, comes only with a Duofold Pen. Likewise, Parker Poise and Balance, and Parker Permanite which makes Duofold pen and pencil barrels Non-Breakable.

Five flashing colors also, from which to select, are an exclusive feature of the Duofold.

Then we guarantee* these famous pens forever against all defects which insures permanent satisfaction.

36 years' experience—29 patents—are combined in Parker Duofold Pens, Pencils and Desk Sets.

What better for a Christmas gift to relative or friend?

One caution: Be sure of the imprint, "Geo. S. Parker—DUOFOLD," on the barrel. That alone makes it genuine.

the champion flyer of the hills

The Flexible Flyer holds the speed, long distance and long service records in every snow-clad part of America! It is the pride of every owner—the envy of every other. The Flexible Flyer will be the hit of Christmas for any child. In no other way can you give so much joy—at so little cost.

What a wonderful gift! It gives the youngsters outdoor healthy life. It is a gift to last for years—long, long after the other presents are broken—forgotten. The Flexible Flyer is not a toy. It is wonderfully made—perfectly safe. Made of finest steel . . . of selected seasoned second-growth ash . . . with perfect steering mechanism . . . with scientific concave runners that grip the snow—aiding in steering and adding distance. There is no substitute for the Flexible Flyer. Every youngster wants "the champion of the hill". Nothing else will satisfy.

With Byrd at the South Pole

Commander Byrd's equipment is the most carefully selected of any expedition ever made. On his boats for his transportation over snow are picked, trained husky dogs, specially constructed sledges —and six No. 5 Flexible Flyers.

There could be no finer sled than the Flexible Flyer—so the Byrd expedition chose the standard Flexible Flyer on which to pack their lighter loads. This choosing was done entirely without our knowledge—on merit alone. They write us that most of the members of the Byrd Expedition grew up with Flexible Flyers and know the value and sturdiness of them.

You, too, can buy from your dealer a Flexible Flyer exactly the same as Commander Byrd is using.

DID you know that Christmas Day was not always celebrated on December 25th? That for hundreds of years after the Nativity people celebrated a "movable festival" and enjoyed Christmas in other months?

While none of us would be willing to dispense with our happy Christmas Day, there are many who would like the spirit of that day carried on over into January, February, March, and all through the year.

Only the other day a friend said to me, "We all worry about Christmas gifts, yet Christmas itself comes and goes so quickly. Of course it's easy to find gifts if you're satisfied to drop into a store and select the first thing you see. But I want to give my real friends something that will last, something that will prolong Christmas."

He was expressing unconsciously something very much like the idea of the "movable festival." And why not? You can give your friends a Christmas every month. Send them THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—something you yourself enjoy, something that comes twelve times a year—as your Christmas gift.

When you send your friends this gift, you make Christmas not quite a movable festival but certainly a lasting one. You express your good wishes not simply for December 25th. You give a present that enriches the life of your friends for twelve long months, carrying on the radiance and happiness of Christmas all through the year.—THE EDITOR.

These are the new Marmon Straight-eights

If you had $3000 to spend for an automobile undoubtedly you would insist upon an eight. Why not use the same care in investing $1500 or $2000?

It is no longer necessary for the medium-price buyer to compromise—for Marmon now offers two great new straight-eights at prices no higher than you have previously been asked to pay for sixes.

Straight-eight results are immediate and unmistakable. Were it possible to drive a car blindfolded to make comparison, there could be no mistaking which cars were fours and sixes and which were straight-eights. You couldn't fail to sense and feel the difference in smoothness and the more immediate power at your command.

To try these new Marmon straight-eights, the New Series 68 and 78, is to get an entirely different interpretation of what a motor car can really do.

Acceleration is instant—never a gap, never a flat-spot. Just put your foot right down. No need to "feed-up" a Marmon straight-eight motor.

On hills—This is where you really find out about the eight. You have to meet a mountain before you need a gear-shift.

And all day long—These cars are not the flashy, sensitive kind that need constant care and adjustment. Just put a Marmon up to your usual driving speed. Leave it there all day if you like. And this goes even for those inclined to be "heavy-footed."

Easy riding—the same famous Marmon characteristic developed even further. Now, more emphatically than ever, "the easiest riding cars in the world."

In the matter of dependability and low upkeep costs, the more than 30,000 Marmon Eights now in the hands of owners have proved conclusively that straight-eight transportation is not one cent more costly than six-cylinder transportation.

In addition to smart lines, Marmon has provided every modern utility and fitment. Then are added color harmonies well away from conventional applications and in the height of good taste.

Won't you try a New Series Marmon 68 or 78 and find what modest money it now takes to purchase really fine car transportation? Any Marmon dealer will gladly place one or both of these new cars at your disposal for any demonstration or comparison you may wish to make.

Ready for a New Day

When the bright morning sunshine slips between your drowsy eyelids, it is saying —"It's time for doing people to be up!"

So off with the soft, warm covers—and a brave sprint for the tub. Into the cool water, to tingle drowsiness away! Oh, it's good to be awake . . . to curvet and splash and make of your tub a mighty ocean!

And Ivory is the floating buoy that cheers you on. When you come spluttering from the first splash, Ivory bobs within your hand's reach, ready to cover you with its gentle, cleansing foam. Then, with a swash of your sponge, the cheerful bubbles rinse instantly away.

What a brisk person you have become . . . ready for breakfast, ready for the day, ready for everything!

Ivory has speeded "doing" people from their morning tubs for 50 years. Most of these people met Ivory first as babies, when a pure, mild soap is tremendously important. Now that they know the value of bath-happiness in their daily adult life, they choose Ivory as the surest means to achieve it.

Come into Drafting!

Men who can read blue-prints and draw plans are "sitting pretty" these days. No wonder, when you consider that every machine, every building, all industrial activities start on the Drafting table! Intensive production, record-breaking construction operations, have created a great demand for expert Draftsmen capable of designing and calculating original plans.

Expert Draftsmen Get BIG Pay Checks!

Get this point—that Drafting isn't just one line of work—it reaches out into the Electrical, Manufacturing, Building Construction, Automotive and Structural industries. That is why you'll find well-paid Drafting positions advertised in all industrial centers of the U. S. 70,000 vacancies reported in the past 12 months. And that is why I advise men to go into Drafting, particularly if handicapped by lack of high-school or college education. Today you are in competition with high-school and college graduates for the better-paid jobs. You must have specialized training to win.

The Entering Wedge to Success in all Building and Manufacturing Lines

I recommend Drafting, too, because it can be QUICKLY learned at home, in spare time—without quitting your job, without losing a day's time or a dollar in pay. Because you're sure there will be a good position waiting when you are ready for it. And because the work is so fascinating and offers better-than-ordinary chances for advancement. For the Draftsman is in close contact with important work and BIG MEN, and he is right in line for promotion to Superintendent and other executive positions.

Home-training backed with an agreement to get you a DRAFTING JOB at a BIG RAISE —or money refunded

Now, at a cost you can afford, on terms of only $6 per month, you can actually BUY a fine Drafting position and a 50% increase in pay. A million-dollar institution contracts to give both—the training, then the employment. Under money-back penalty.

This agreement brings you your SECOND CHANCE. To repair a neglected education, to specialize, to change to a line where you can get ahead more rapidly. Read it, and investigate it!

The American School

Chartered 30 years as an EDUCATIONAL institution. We offer complete, thorough up-to-date instruction, built by 200 leading Educators, Engineers and Executives. A unique instruction, built to meet the specifications of well-paid jobs as laid down by employers themselves, yet simplified for ready understanding by men with only common schooling.

O. C. MILLER
Director Extension Work

And we are the first in the home study field to recognize the need of giving a COMPLETE SERVICE to ambitious men—training, plus employment. Which takes you as you are, supplies the equipment you lack, and lands you in the better job you seek. Without risk to you!

3 Drafting Lessons! Actually FREE!

to prove you can learn at home, in your spare time!

You will never have a more serious personal problem than deciding your future life-work—so we merely urge you to LOOK INTO Drafting. See how you like it, see if you learn as readily as most men do, get the facts about the opportunities, the salaries paid, the jobs open, the chances for promotion. This is why, on receipt of your name, we will send you the first three lessons of our Drafting course without cost or obligation.

O. C. MILLER, Director Extension Work,
THE AMERICAN SCHOOL,

Dept. D-91, Drexel Ave. & 58th St.

Tooth paste buys a muffler for Dad

It sounds mysterious—but isn't. Do a little arithmetic with us and find out. The average dentifrice costs you 50c. You use about a tube a month. Twelve times fifty equals six dollars, the yearly cost. Listerine Tooth Paste costs 25c (the large tube). Twelve times twenty-five equals three dollars. All right. Six dollars minus three dollars equals three dollars, your annual saving. Spend it as you please. The muffler is merely a suggestion. You have a thousand alternatives. Hosiery, for instance, or gloves, or handkerchiefs.

Not by price alone did this dentifrice seize popularity

WHAT accounts for the immediate success of this speedy new dentifrice? Certainly not the price alone.

While it is true that at 25c, Listerine Tooth Paste accomplishes an average saving of three dollars a year per person, over dentifrices costing double that amount, this would not carry it so quickly to a position among the leaders.

It is the combination of outstanding quality, unquestioned results, and a reasonable price, that has done the trick.

Naturally, such a price for such a paste is made possible only by ultra-modern methods of manufacture and mass production.

We urge you to try Listerine Tooth Paste. It will be a revelation to you.

Note how white it makes your teeth. How gently it polishes them—yet how speedily. Note, too, how cool, sweet and refreshed your mouth feels long after the brushing is over—that cleanly taste you associate with Listerine.

We are proud of this product, and we ask you to compare it with any paste, at any price, and judge by results alone. At all druggists. Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, Mo., U.S.A.
